I remain, very truly,

ELI M. HOOVER,
Mayor of Halstead, Kans.

NEWTON, KANS., January 10, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: It has been a source of great annoyance to me to observe that some of the men in our country holding high positions in the governmental agency of our country should be so biased and unfriendly to any cause that they would permit themselves to appear before the great legislative bodies of the Nation and there make statements which, would they only take pains to verify before speaking, would find most false.

Anyone who states privately or publicly that prohibition in Kansas is not a success makes such statement either through ignorance, desire to mislead, or on account of bias and prejudice to the cause of temperance.

During the past 30 years I have been in position to observe the condition of the growth of temperance under prohibition in this State; I have conducted cases as prosecutor and as defender for many years, and I will be frank with you and state that for a number of years I have not defended a single liquor case in this (Harvey) county, for two very good reasons: First, we never here have a man charged with the offense of selling liquor, except he be a "low-down bum," a vagabond, an alley rat, or some fiend who has not arisen to the dignity of mature manhood, who is without means and only resorts to the alleys and byways to vend his goods; and, in the second place, I believe that no self-respecting attorney can afford to lower himself ou the plane with these men and defend his acts.

To say that there is no whisky sold in Kansas would state an untruth; there is not a criminal statute that is not sometimes violated, but if we could remove whisky-ridden Missouri from our border the prohibition law would be less frequently violated than many other criminal statutes in our code. If Missouri will adopt prohibition, she will make one of the greatest advancements she has ever made and at the same time relieve Kansas of one of the greatest menaces she has in the enforcement of her prohibitory law.

There are a few places in Kansas where it is a little hard to enforce the law, but this for the principal reason that they are close to Missouri and are touched with the contaminating influences of that State, and in a few other localities, far apart, where the sentiment of the major portion of the people is in accord with the sentiment expressed by some of our so-called Representatives, makes it difficult to procure peace officers who will faithfully perform their trust.

You can call the lie on any person who seeks to defame the name of this State with reference to prohibition, and an investigation of the facts will serve to place you among the true representatives of the people where you rightfully belong.

I could cite instances, furnish proof of my statements, and supply you with much data which would refute all adverse comment, but same would not subserve your purpose.

Hoping that you may be able to crucify all Judases and annihilate all blasphemers against prohibition, I beg to be and remain,

Respectfully,

B. H. TURNER, City Attorney.

JETMORE, KANS., January 6, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Yours of recent date asking about the working of our so-called prohibition law was received.

In response thereto will say that I am fully satisfied with the law and the manner in which it is enforced. All that is required is action by our National Congress in order that our State law may be made more effective.

I came to Hodgeman County 39 years ago. At that time the county was unorganized. I have witnessed, taken part in, and lived through the great struggle to elimnate the saloon and the liquor traffic from the State.

That the law works and is enforced must be admitted by the most rabid saloonist. When it is remembered that the principal features of the law says "no make" and "no sale" of liquor within the State it becomes apparent that it does prohibit. There are no breweries, distilleries, or saloons within the State, although there is an occasional bootlegger. But there also are an occasional horse thief, a cattle thief, an embezzler, a murderer, etc.

The reason why there are no breweries, distilleries, nor saloons within the State is because such institutions are prohibited by law. And the law does prohibit.

Those who declare that our prohibition law does not prohibit will point to the fact that some liquor is drank within the State and that there are some cases of drunkenness, even more cases of drunkenness than there ought to be. These apologists for the liquor traffic try to make it appear that when one takes a drink of liquor within the State or gets drunk the prohibition law has been violated. But such is not the case. There is no law in Kansas which forbids one to take a drink of liquor; and as long as one may lawfully ship it into the State as interstate commerce more or less liquor will be drank and there will be more or less cases of drunkenness. In all this there is no violation of the prohibition law, as the law against drunkenness is not properly a part of the prohibition law, for such law existed before the passage of our prohibition law, and such law against drunkenness is a part of the law of every State where the saloon exists.

So it is quite beside the question to point to the fact that intoxicating liquor is lawfully shipped into the State and drank and that there are some cases of drunkenness as a result as constituting a violation of the prohibition law. But all this does show the imperative need for action by our Federal Congress so as to forbid the shipment of liquor into dry States. Instead of such facts showing a violation of the prohibition law, it shows a culpable inaction on the part of Congress. One may look at the Wilson Act, the Webb-Kenyon Act, etc., and see where mere sops have been thrown to States that have been trying for years to elimnate a great evil. And just what may lawfully be done under those acts is pointed out as a violation of our State prohibition law. Hypocrisy can go no further.

You will readily perceive that Federal action is necessary in order that our prohibition law may be made to work more effectively. Why this action should not come from Congress without awaiting a constitutional amendment is a matter I do not comprehend. Of course, to await the adoption of a constitutional amendment delays the matter and gives the saloon forces time to attempt to change public sentiment. When I hear a man talking about taking steps to suppress the liquor traffic and his scheme postpones the time of effective action to some distant future day I feel some doubts as to his real attitude toward the question. Perhaps I should say that I feel no doubt as to where he stands. What is desired is action now. If Congress has exclusive power to regulate interstate commerce, why not commence now and regulate and prevent the shipment of intoxicating liquor into dry States?

We forbid the shipment into the State of Texas cattle for fear they might give our stock Texas or Spanish fever, and the act is valid, but rot-gut whisky is an article of interstate commerce and must come in.

Senator, give us an act of Congress at once that will prevent the shipment of liquor into dry territory, or permit the dry States to do so. Then the matter of a constitutional amendment can be submitted and we can await the time for action thereon.

With best wishes for you now and in the future, I am,

Very truly, yours,

ALBERT H. WILSON,
County Attorney.

P. S.—I go out of the office of county attorney Monday, but am still a Democrat and ready to do all necessary work.

JACKSON COUNTY.

OFFICE OF SHERIFF OF JACKSON COUNTY,
Holton, Kans., January 11, 1917.

Senator THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Yours of December 30, 1916, received some time ago. Pardon me for not answering sooner. I am sure pleased to hear that you are taking the position you are on the question of prohibition, for if there is any one issue that I think should become a national law it surely should be the question of prohibition.

From my observation the intoxicating liquor that is shipped into the State of Kansas from Missouri and other States not having the prohibitory law causes at least 90 per cent of the criminal cases that are brought before the courts.

I have kept a record of the men that have come under my control as sheriff in the years of 1915 and 1916, and find that 96 per cent of them drink intoxicating liquors and 90 per cent are cigarette users. I know these figures to be correct and I am sure that it is an easy matter to decide what liquor will do for a man.

I am giving you these facts just as I have experienced and observed them and give you my consent to use them in any way that will help to bring about any good national prohibitory law.

Any time that I can be of any service to you let me know.

I am, yours, respectfully,

JEFFERSON COUNTY.

OFFICE OF SHERIFF OF JEFFERSON COUNTY,
Oskaloosa, Kans., January 5, 1917.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your letter of 30th ultimo, making inquiry regarding prohibition in Kansas duly received.

The consumption of intoxicating liquors in this county is not more than 10 to 15 per cent of what it was before prohibition, but the quality is bad and is obtained from Missouri, this county being only one county from the Missouri River.

The prohibitory law is well enforced in this county and violations called "bootlegging" exists in only a few places, and are very carefully and cautiously conducted.

The close proximity to the Missouri line is taken advantage of to procure liquor, and the illicit nature of this creates a desire to use it immediately and this, with the vile character of the liquor itself, is the cause of 99 per cent of the drunkenness in this county.

This use and abuse is confined to the low element of whites and negroes. It is nearly impossible for a respectable looking person to buy a drink of liquor within the county. During the past two years the jail has been vacant 204 days, over one-fourth of the time.

The total confinement in the county jail during the past two years has been 1,515 days, of which 1,320 days was for violations of the prohibitory law, and serving sentences thereunder. Nearly every arrest has resulted in conviction for several years.

Respectfully, yours,

E. W. O'BRIEN, Sheriff Jefferson County.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of the 30th ultimo, I will say that I am absolutely of the opinion that prohibition in Kansas is not a failure notwithstanding statements and representations made by our neighbors from Missouri, and in my opinion the law is a good one, and the more strict it is made the better it will be. I don't believe that Kansas has the drunkenness or crimes and other resulting immorality that the people of Missouri have, and I would rather cut off my head than to go back on the things given us by the people in the eighties, which have been a great help and blessing to us. I am for national prohibition first, last, and for all time.

County Attorney, Jewell County, Kans.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,

DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of December 30 in regard to the success or failure of prohibition in Kansas, will say that in my opinion it has been a great success.

Although our prohibition laws might be made more strict, yet I believe that the reduced number of crimes committed, the morality, prosperity, and the great progress of Kansas can be attributed to prohibition.

Yours, very truly,

B. L. HART, County Attorney.

KINGMAN COUNTY.

KINGMAN, KANS., January 4, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Yours relative to prohibition in Kansas at hand, and will say that whatever failure that might be charged to the law in this State is chargeable to the attitude of the National Government.

They reserve the right to allow anyone at any time to ship booze into this State, and go farther, and give them licenses to operate. Kansas has good laws, and they do lots of good, but they are handicapped in that they are nullified in so many ways by the national attitude.

You, of course, know that the worst boozers that we have in this State have acquired the appetite in other States and have come here, thinking that they could get away from it and straighten up. When they got here, they found it so easy to get it from another State under the interstate-commerce act that the result was that they have gone on in their drinking, and any unlawful act they might have committed was credited to the State of Kansas and the failure of the prohibition laws here.

We have some drunkenness here, but I find in nearly every case it is the result of a club shipment of liquor, and then they meet at some party's home or barn and get drunk. If the shipments were under the control of the State or prohibited, there would be some chance to control the situation here.

At this time we have the most in our city jail that there has been at any one time in three years. We have three there. Two for New Year's drunks and one for bootlegging. I presume that this will compare favorably even now with cities of this size in other States having saloons. We have a population of about 3,000.

The time is coming that a man who wishes any favors from Kansas will have to stand right on this liquor proposition. It will be well for you to look over the record in the last campaign of that man Kirschner, who went into the campaign with no money behind him and to what was most certainly a losing fight as far as election was concerned.

Hope you succeed in getting something through.

Yours, truly,

CLYDE MURPHY,
Mayor of the City of Kingman.

LABETTE COUNTY.

POLICE COURT,
Parsons, Kans., January 6, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your letter of the 30th instant in regard to prohibition in Kansas, I will say that it is a great success.

Up to the time when prohibition came into effect, about June 1, 1909, there were 23 drug stores in Parsons that sold intoxicating liquors. This astounding number of drug stores was diminished to five after the law went into effect. After my years of experience, I believe I can say that 90 per cent of all crimes committed are caused by intoxicating liquors. Prohibition has lessened drunkenness and crime and has resulted economically as well as morally advantageous to our people.

You have my permission to use this as you wish in the Senate to gain national prohibition for our people and make our country a better place in which to live.

Trusting that these statistics will help you in your fight, I remain,

Sincerely, yours,

T. A. MURRY, Chief of Police.

CHETOPA, KANS., January 10, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In response to your letter of the 1st of this month regarding prohibition.

This letter would have been answered before, but owing to my absence from the city this delay was caused.

I came to Chetopa shortly after Kansas became a prohibition State, and I am convinced that prohibition is the proper method of reducing crimes, and also aids very materially in providing better homes and better families; and I am not classed among the strict prohibition people, either, although I am now serving my tenth year as mayor of this prohibition city, and I believe absolutely in the enforcement of the law.

In connection with this I would like to suggest to you to introduce a law restricting the Government from issuing Government licenses to sell liquor of any kind in any of the prohibition States. Whenever that is accomplished we will not be bothered any longer with bootleggers. Would be glad to hear from you on this proposition.

With kindest regards to you, I remain,

Truly, yours,

DEAR SIR: In answer to your letter of the 30th December in regard to prohibition, I think I can say that we have none or very little drunkenness in our town now. We are too near Kansas City, Mo., to do away with all drinking, but I know that there is far less drinking than if we had saloons. We certainly would not go back to the wide-open saloon.

OFFICE OF CITY ATTORNEY,
Leavenworth, Kans., January 6, 1917.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am just in receipt of your letter of the 3d instant asking for a statement giving my experience and observation as to whether prohibition in Kansas is a failure, or actually prohibits, thereby lessening drunkenness and crime and resulting morally and economically advantageous to the people of Kansas.

I desire to say emphatically that prohibition in Kansas has not been a failure. Because of the fact that Kansas borders on the wet State of Missouri the enforcement of the prohibitory law in the border counties is very difficult and quite expensive, and yet there are hundreds of young men in those counties who have never been in a saloon, and many others who have never been in a saloon except when they went across the river into Missouri.

The saloons and liquor houses in the cities adjoining Kansas and which cluster along the border on the Missouri side are a great curse to the people of Kansas, and except for them the enforcement of the prohibitory law in this State would be comparatively easy.

Every honest self-respecting citizen of the great State of Missouri ought to blush and hide his face in shame at the obstacles placed in the way of the enforcement of the prohibitory law in Kansas by the law-defying rum sellers of Missouri, who persist in sending liquor into Kansas to be sold in violation of law.

Of course, there are violations of the prohibitory law in Kansas and will continue to be until Missouri wipes out her disgrace by barring intoxicating liquor from the State.

Notwithstanding all of the difficulties of enforcement, I am confident that there is not on the statute books of the State another law or dozen laws which have, and will continue to have, such beneficial results to our people, both economically and morally, as the prohibitory liquor laws. The sentiment in favor of prohibition is growing stronger all the time. The drunkard is a disgrace and the rum seller is an outlaw in Kansas.

If there is anything in this letter which will be of any help to you, you are at liberty to use it as you see fit.

Yours, very respectfully,

C. P. RUTHERFORD,
City Attorney.

DEAR SENATOR: In reply to yours of the 2d instant, will say that prohibition has prohibited in this city for the last 15 years. That is as long as I have resided here. Also in the county.

LINN COUNTY.

OFFICE OF COUNTY ATTORNEY,
Mound City, Kans., January 2, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Gladly do I give my experience, observation, and views upon the prohibition question in Kansas, and you are at liberty to use the same in any way advantageous to the cause.

All laws to be effective must be backed by public sentiment. Under prohibition in Kansas we have raised up a generation of men and women who are radically opposed to the use of intoxicating liquors and intoxication. I was elected in 1914 on a law-enforcement platform, carrying every precinct in the county, and in 1916 was reelected without opposition on either ticket, and this after two years of rigid enforcement of the prohibitory liquor law. This I believe is proof conclusive that the sentiment in Linn County is against bootlegging, drinking, and drunkenness. Furthermore, I find the prohibitory law the easiest law on the statute book to enforce.

Does prohibition prohibit?

During the holidays just passed, in an entire county of over 15,000 inhabitants only two cases of drunkenness were reported. There is not enough liquor delivered in Linn County to make a good business for one saloon; in wet States the small towns have nearly as many saloons as groceries. If that were the case here we would have 37 saloons.

A drunk is so scarce as to be a curiosity; half the youth of Linn County never have seen a drunken man and few, indeed, who ever saw a drunk woman.

If the Members of Congress, especially those from wet States, could step into the hundreds of happy, prosperous homes of Linn County, Kans., and ascertain the small quantity of liquors consumed there, and then go to the few unhappy, wretched, poverty-stricken homes where much of the earnings of the family are spent with some liquor dealer in Kansas City, Mo., it would be proof sufficient that Kansas prohibition was a success; but in order to make it complete we need to make Missouri dry and stop Uncle Sam from bootlegging liquor into our dry State.

Here is hoping that you and your fellow workers will keep up your worthy fight until you smoke out the opposition and hold them up to the ridicule of the world; after that they will not hold out long, but will give us national prohibition, which will be the greatest achievement in the United States since the emancipation of the slaves.

Yours, truly,

HARRY W. FISHER, County Attorney.

PLEASANTON, KANS., January 7, 1917.

WM. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate.

HONORABLE SIR: Your letter received inquiring in regard to the effectiveness of the Kansas prohibitory law.

The young people of Kansas do not know what it is to have whisky and beer flaunted in their faces from a saloon, and the only whisky that enters the State is via the express companies, which the United States Government forces us to allow, or that which is packed in by individuals who are addicted to the habits or wishes to bootleg for the profit they receive.

Pleasanton, the town which I have the honor to serve, with a population of over fifteen hundred, has not had occasion to cause the arrest of a single individual in nine months. We have had three convictions in nearly two years, and two of these were for packing whisky in from Missouri and one was drunkenness.

The whisky and beer that comes into Pleasanton via the express companies is consumed in private, but being an officer I have the privilege of knowing who get it, and I find that the only people, as a rule, who are hard to collect rentals from (I am manager of a telephone company) are those who receive the shipments, and practically the only criminals who have been convicted in this vicinity are those who are addicted to its use.

Respectfully,

SAMUEL TUCKER, Mayor.

LYON COUNTY.

EMPORIA, KANS., January 8, 1917.

Senator WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your communication regarding the efficiency of prohibition in Kansas came duly to hand. I have been police judge of Emporia for nearly three years and so have had some experience with the prohibitory law in this State. Coming from an Illinois town to Emporia, I have had some opportunity for comparison of the two general policies represented in these two States, and I have no hesitancy in saying that the liquor business in Kansas is a mighty poor business to engage in, as compared with that same business in Illinois. If I were going to engage in the liquor business, with my experience I certainly would not choose Kansas as a promising location. For instance, in looking over the police-court docket for the month of December, 1916, and including both holidays, I find that there were only four cases of drunkenness coming into the police court. If Illinois can produce a town having about 12,000 inhabitants with a record like that, they would be compelled to choose some other town than the one I lived in for 14 years. The greatest value of the prohibitory law in Kansas, in my judgment, is the removing from the towns the open saloon, which keeps our boys from becoming familiar with this evil. There are plenty of grown young men in Kansas who have never seen an open saloon. This I account a great gain. My experience of 11 years flatly contradicts the claim made by the enemies of prohibition that it is a failure. Wishing you every success in your fight for nation-wide prohibition, I am,

Most sincerely,

JOHN H. J. RICE,
Police Judge, Emporia, Kans.

DEAR SENATOR: In answer to your communication of December 30 as to failure of prohibition in Kansas, will say that Kansas is greatly benefited by prohibition. Its failure exists only in the written pamphlets of its opponents. Resubmission in Kansas would only increase its dry vote. I am not opposed to the use of liquor by those who are able to use it. I do not know what else I can add.

MARSHALL COUNTY.

BLUE RAPIDS, KANS., January 8, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 30th read with interest. We have punished about 14 cases of drunkenness and disorderly cases the last year, our docket shows; possibly as many more escaped. In most of these cases the cause we attribute to being brought from a Nebraska saloon 30 miles to the north of us. While these cases have caused some trouble, we feel thankful we have no saloons in Kansas. If whisky-house literature should be prohibited from using the mail system, it would cut our trouble in half. We think also when the Nebraska saloons are closed our trouble will be over entirely.

You are to be congratulated upon the work you are about to undertake. With the assistance of good officers you will succeed, no doubt; we are ready to assist you in every way possible. Do not fail to write me if anything can be done to aid you.

With kindest regards, I am,

MEADE COUNTY.

MEADE, KANS., January 8, 1917.

Hon. WM. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt of yours of recent date, inquiring concerning the operation of the prohibitory liquor law in Kansas. In reply will say it has been my observation during an experience of 10 years as county attorney that the prohibitory liquor law does not prohibit the use of intoxicating liquor any more than the laws defining and punishing larceny prevent stealing. The prohibitory law is violated, and so are all of our criminal statutes, and, so far as I can see, one is respected about as much as another.

If it were not for that fact that it is so easy to obtain intoxicating liquors by express from points outside the State, there would be no more difficulty in enforcing this law than in enforcing the laws against homicide. And if the shipment of liquor into dry territory were absolutely prohibited, the sale of liquor in Kansas would be as rare as homicide Prohibition does prohibit, and anyone making statements to the contrary shows either woeful ignorance or willful desire to mislead.

Very truly, yours,

FRANK S. SULLIVAN,
County Attorney.

MIAMI COUNTY.

OFFICE OF SHERIFF OF MIAMI COUNTY,
Paola, Kans., January 4, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I received your letter of December 30, 1916, relative to the prohibition question in Kansas. At the outset I desire to say that it is no longer a question in Kansas. Prohibition is a fixed institution that not only prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquors but has dispensed with drunkenness and made crime a minimum.

I have seen more drunkards in Kansas City, Mo., in one day than in Kansas in my entire term of office of a little over two years. The majority of the crime committed in this county as well as in the county north of us, which is in close proximity to Kansas City, Mo., is caused by the criminals and drunkards that come out of Kansas City, Mo. I live in the border county, and considering its close proximity to whisky-infested Missouri, will say that the percentage of crime committed in this county is unusually small. The prohibition law is enforced in this county as well as in other counties of this State that have come under my observation. The people, as well as the officers of the law and the courts, insist upon enforcing this law.

* * * * * * *

Although you and I are not of the same political faith, I heartily agree with the fight that you are making in behalf of prohibition, and should you desire to use this letter to answer the charges that are made against the proposition of the enforcement of the prohibitory law of this State you are at liberty to do so.

Yours, very respectfully,

M. E. STEVENSON, Sheriff.

MITCHELL COUNTY.

BELOIT, KANS., January 6, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Beg to acknowledge receipt of your favor of the 3d. Replying thereto will say that the writer has been city attorney of Beloit, Kans., for about eight years; also county attorney of Mitchell County, Kans., for four years. Prior to this the writer was deputy county attorney in this county for some time, and prior to that deputy sheriff for some time.

Beloit is a town of about 4,000 population, but its trade district extends over quite a bit of territory, for it is the largest town in the sixth congressional district in this State. My experience and observation as enforcing officer of this State is decidedly in favor of prohibition. The following are some of the things that caused me to express this view:

First. During the past 25 years we have had but one murder case in this county.

Second. For several terms of our district court we have had no criminal cases whatever. The present bar docket shows not a single criminal case.

Third. We scarcely average two cases a month in our police court, and some years have not averaged more than one a month.

Fourth. We have held public meetings, such as barbecues and the like, in this town in which there were over 10,000 in attendance without having a single police court or a county criminal court case arising therefrom or in connection therewith.

Fifth. The three banks in this city have deposits aggregating one and a half millions.

Sixth. Our pauper list is almost nothing. Our mayor informs me this morning that those receiving aid from the city are only three in number.

Seventh. The county poor are also very few. The county clerk informs me that there are only five persons on the county at this time.

Eighth. The population of this county is about 15,000, and the number of automobiles registered is 1,756.

Ninth. The writer believes from observation that this county will be better as soon as the dry law goes into effect in Nebraska, and this for the reason that we are close enough to the line that liquor has been in some instances brought across from the saloons in Superior, Nebr., and several of our drunk cases and other cases have been directly traceable and caused by parties coming from these saloons in Superior, Nebr.

I might add that the writer has had occasion to visit in a number of other States, and has had legal practice there, and by way of comparison I will give you just a few outside experiences:

First. In Butte, Mont., before the militia took charge, following the miners' union dynamiting deal, the average was 50 cases a day in the police court. When the saloons were closed, the court went as long as 36 hours without a single case.

Second. Butte, as is well known, has one of the largest pay rolls per capita, and boasts of being one of the richest towns of its size, and has as many saloons as the most ardent saloon advocates would recommend, and yet at the above-mentioned time the city's income was approximately $30,000 a month, and its expenses were approximately $35,000 per month, and it was difficult to cash a city warrant unless it was about two years old. In many cases city warrants were being heavily discounted for cash. Some of the above came under the writer's personal observation and others were given by parties apparently in a position to know the facts.

You are perfectly at liberty to use this letter in your fight, and I shall be glad to give you any further information that is possible for me to give.

Most respectfully, yours,

A. E. JORDAN,
City Attorney.

BELOIT, KANS., January 3, 1917.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR In reply to yours of December 30, 1916, would say the prohibitory law is a good law but needs the cooperation of the Federal Government so the violators will not get off so easy. I believe we should have no Government stamps in a dry State, but as it is it keeps our boys in check from what it would be if our State was a wet State. I really believe a Nation-wide prohibitory law would be the best remedy.

Yours, truly,

JOHN W. HAYES, Sheriff.

MONTGOMERY COUNTY.

CHERRYVALE, KANS., January 5, 1917.

Hon. WM. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Your letter asking me as to my opinion regarding prohibition received. I will say that there is absolutely no comparison as to conditions in our State compared with other States having no prohibitionary laws. I have read with pleasure the stand that you have taken and your efforts in the Senate to bring about national prohibition, and I heartily recommend you for it.

* * * The writer, who traveled before being elected to the office of mayor of Cherryvale, Kans., made Missouri as part of his territory; and I want to say that there were 50 drunkards in Missouri to 1 in Kansas, and that there were more prostitutes and other bad characters in like comparison.

Prohibition in Kansas is not a failure; it certainly has lessened crime, uplifted morals; our people have lived better, dressed better, which fact I attribute to prohibition law. Kansas has demonstrated the fact that liquor is a menace to everything that is good, upright, and honest, and that people can get along without liquor. I know that in our city our people would vote 9 to 1 in favor of national prohibition.

Commending you for your efforts to secure national prohibition, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

MILTON COOK,
Mayor of City of Cherryvale, Kans.

Hon. WM. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your very kind inquiry of December 30, permit me to say that I heartily approve of the fight you are making in the Senate against the misrepresentations that are constantly being made harmful to the good name of our fair State and her prohibitory liquor law.

The prohibitory liquor law of Kansas is not a failure any more than the laws against murder and horse stealing are failures. The law in each case is a good one, and laws that tend to make our State a better State in which to live and rear our families. This law, like all others, is broken and does not always prohibit the sale of intoxicants, but it does prohibit a numberless amount of sales; it does prohibit much drunkenness and distress among our people; and it does give them many moral and economical advantages which they would not have to enjoy were the law repealed or had it never been enacted.

Those of us who live, move, and have our being within the borders of the great Sunflower State, rejoice in but few other things as we do in the knowledge that our boys and girls are free from the contaminations that always go hand in hand with the free and unrestricted sale of booze. We rejoice to know that the good people of our State are making an honest effort to maintain and strengthen this condition, and that in these efforts we are receiving much encouragement and assistance from the sister States of our Union and the men who represent them in our National Congress.

Locally the conditions are not just as I would have them, but a marked improvement over a few years ago is evident, and the enforcement of our liquor law is being aided greatly by the other nearby States getting into the dry column. National prohibition is the next forward step we of Kansas expect to see along this line. And may its coming be hastened by the action of Congress.

Very truly, yours,

T. C. HANSEN, Mayor.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to your favor of January 2, 1917, asking about the effect of the prohibition laws of Kansas, as they have been brought to my attention in this city, I have to say there is no comparison to be made between the condition of the people and their condition when the prohibition law took effect 35 years ago.

We have no poor, shivering, barefoot children here now in winter, and many families who were destitute then because of liquor, are, and have been for years, well to do, owning their own homes, and their children educated and respected citizens.

I have been carefully over my docket for the years 1915 and 1916, and give these actual facts:

Number of arrests made for drunkenness in two years, 53. Number of inhabitants in Cherryvale, 4,500.

This is about 1 arrest to each 170 inhabitants in one year. Eleven of these were put off trains here, intoxicated, and were not our citizens.

Several are repetitions, three or four as many as five times. Deduct repetitions and transients put off trains because they were intoxicated, leaves about 30 of our own individual citizens who have been drunk here in two years, 15 average for each year.

This is not because arrests have been avoided when they should have been made, and any officer allowing "drunks" to go free here would be discharged immediately.

There is no "boozer" among our city officials from the mayor down.

There are no "joints," and the bootlegging is confined to the lowest type of whites and blacks.

* * * * * * *

Individually, I have not seen a drunken person on our streets for two years.

With highest personal regards,

I remain yours, as ever,

REVILO NEWTON, Police Judge.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR THOMPSON: I am in receipt of your letter of January 5, asking for my experience, observation, and views as law-enforcement officer of the prohibitory law of the State of Kansas.

I have been city attorney for about 10 years and am firmly of the opinion that the present law which is in force in this State is successful and has accomplished great good.

As you know, the State has enacted several prohibitory laws, and the present law forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquors for any purpose has accomplished wonderful results in lessening crime and drunkenness. It has resulted in families having more happiness and pleasure in life than they had before.

When the drug stores had permits to sell intoxicating liquors the police court of this city tried a large number of cases, the greater per cent of which were drunkenness. Since the enacting of the law herein referred to our police courts have been idle, with the falling off of 95 per cent of cases that were before it under the permit system. Our court records will bear me out in the statement above.

Wishing you much success, I am,

Yours, truly,

J. A. BRADY, City Attorney.

SIR: Yours of December 30 at hand. Will say in reply that I am heartily in favor of national prohibition. But as Kansas is now she is in a hard row, as the shipments are heavy in the little towns and no way of stopping the shipping. It is a poor grade of whisky, most of which is poison. If we could get national prohibition it would stop the making of all kinds of liquors. We have a good many drunks on hand-made whisky. Fight it hard. Let's get national prohibition in four years from now—in 1920.

Yours, truly,

J. C. FULLENWIDER.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Having held the office of police judge in the city of Lindsborg, Kans., for over 20 years, I have had the opportunity to observe the working of the prohibitory liquor law as applied to Kansas. As you know, individuals can order whisky and have it shipped to them for their own use, and our prohibition law acts more specially to prohibit the saloon than the use of liquors.

There is no question in my mind but that the law was a wise measure and that it has saved thousands of dollars for Kansas people to be applied to the buying of the necessities of the home circle instead of going into the coffers of the whisky dealers.

I have taken the trouble to look at my docket for the past seven years, from January 1, 1910, to January 1, 1917, and I find that I have heard 86 cases, of which 47 were for drunkenness.

Our population has ranged from 2,000 to 2,200 during this time. I will venture to say that I believe that one saloon in Lindsborg in three months' time would have brought more business to the police court than I have had in seven years.

You can not fight the demon rum any too hard, Senator, and at least hit the saloon hard and keep on hitting is my very earnest desire.

Very truly, yours,

ALLEN WILBER,
Police Judge, Lindsborg, Kans.

Senator WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your inquiry concerning the enforcement of the prohibitory law in Kansas I will give you my experience as police judge, which office I have filled since May, 1914.

During this time I have tried 21 liquor cases in my court. However, of this number one man was tried four times and two others three times apiece, reducing the number of persons before me to 14 for violation of the liquor laws.

We are not troubled by bootlegging, the source of supply being found in the border towns of Nebraska, which are easily accessible by automobiles from Sabetha.

This being a town of about 2,600 people and a fine farming country, well settled, I believe that Sabetha enforces the liquor law as well as any town in Kansas.

Am glad to know that you are taking the right step for the betterment of our State, and the good people of this part are with you in your fight for the good cause.

Yours, very truly,

J. L. MUSGROVE,
Police Judge.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your letter of December 30, 1916, relative to your inquiry as to whether prohibition in Kansas is a failure or actually prohibits, I will say that in our city we are strictly enforcing the prohibitory law, and we have very little drunkenness, and as a consequence our police court has very little or nothing to do. Fights, crime, and immorality, the usual results of drunkenness, are absolutely unknown in our community. I can therefore emphatically declare that prohibition does prohibit, and you may use this in any manner you see fit. You may rest assured you have the strong support of your State and hearty approval of your stand on this important question. With the best wishes for your success, I am,

Yours, most respectfully,

A. S. ROSS, Mayor.

SENECA, KANS., January 4, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Replying to your inquiry of date December 30, 1916, would say it appears to me useless to multiply figures and quote statistics to prove that the prohibition law in Kansas lessens drunkenness and crime and that its result is morally and economically to the advantage of the people of the State. Very few really believe that it does not have this effect, except those who are directly interested in the liquor traffic or profit indirectly thereby. There is no one so hard to convince as the person who does not desire to be convinced.

The best argument for the success of the prohibitory law in Kansas is that the sentiment of the State is overwhelmingly in its favor. All political parties unite in indorsing it, and the last attempt of a candidate, even in a commercial center, seeking indorsement from the voters upon a platform of resubmission met with inglorious failure. I suggest that it would be a very pertinent inquiry for you to make of the opponents of prohibition whether or not they could cite you to any other law which they claimed to have been a failure and yet which grew in popular favor as the years went by.

To say that the law absolutely prevents the sale or consumption of intoxicating liquors within the State would be folly. As long as human nature is fallible and avarice is characteristic of some individuals, the prohibitory law, as well as other criminal laws, will occasionally be broken.

In all the northern and eastern tier of counties in Kansas much embarrassment in the due enforcement of the law has resulted from the fact that the States of Nebraska and Missouri were both "wet territory." In the northern tier of counties this embarrassment will soon be relieved as the result of the recent election in the State of Nebraska. It still exists, however, in the eastern tier of counties.

As I suggested above, it seems to me that the necessity for figures and argument has passed. Prohibition is an on-coming tide, and it is now time for action rather than talk. The greatest menace to a proper enforcement of the prohibitory law is the tacit partnership of the United States in the liquor traffic and the thwarting to some extent of State prohibitory laws by interstate traffic. Congress should enact legislation that will permit the prohibition of shipments of "wet goods" into "dry territory." Local laws and sentiment should not be permitted to be set at naught by this bogie of interstate commerce.

Kansas approves your fight upon this question and looks to you, as one of its Representatives in the United States Senate, to do all in your power to further the interests of prohibition, which is firmly established in our State constitution, upon our statute books, and in the minds and hearts of the people of the State you have the honor to represent.

I am,

Sincerely, yours,

HORACE M. BALDWIN,
County Attorney.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. THOMPSON: Replying to your letter of recent date concerning the question as to whether prohibition in Kansas is a failure or whether it lessens drunkenness and crimes, will say that I have had some experience in prosecuting the offenders in the State of Kansas during six years of the eight. The first two years of my experience was as city attorney of Chanute, Kans., a city of about 10,000 population, during which time we prosecuted a number of parties in the police court for selling intoxicating liquor. Following these two years I was county attorney of Neosho County, in which county the city of Chanute is situated, and I prosecuted a large number of offenders against prohibitory liquor law during those two years. I am now closing my second term of office as county attorney, and will say that during the past two years I have prosecuted a number of offenders against this law, and it has been my personal observation that in every city in this county where the officers do their duty in enforcing the laws intoxication is greatly decreased and all of the crimes attending intoxication and strong drink have been wonderfully lessened; and I know that the prohibitory liquor law in Kansas lessens the sale and use of intoxicating liquor and lessens many other classes of crimes, such as immoral conduct, assaults, murders, burglary, larceny, and highway robbery, for these are several of the classes of cases that intoxicated men or men craving intoxicating liquor are most likely to commit. I have talked with a number of lawyers who have practiced in this State at a time when intoxicating liquor was quite freely used and have also practiced ever since. Some of these men had quite extensive criminal lawbreaking when whisky was freely used in this State, and everyone that I have talked with has told me that when intoxicating liquor left the State, or when the prohibition liquor law came to the State, crime was so lessened that the law business for the criminal lawyer almost entirely ceased. I believe in prohibition and temperance, and I will be glad to see the day come when we will have made prohibition and when the Government will be entirely out of the booze business and will in no manner connive and give its assistance to intemperance and in no way tolerate or help to make the rum traffic easy.

You will have my permission to read this letter, all or in part, quote from it verbatim, or use any expression or suggestion from it in your fight upon the floor of Congress or in any other place. The people of Kansas are with you and behind you in your fight for national prohibition, and everybody in Kansas ought to be proud, and most of them are proud, to have a United States Senator from Kansas who stands for square and national prohibition and for morality.

If there is anything that I can do to help you I shall only be too glad to do so. Next Monday I begin serving my third term as county attorney in this county, and during the next two years, if there is anything that the county attorney of Neosho County can do to help, I want you to know that I stand ready to do so.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Very truly, yours,

R. B. SMITH,
County Attorney.

NESS COUNTY.

NESS CITY, KANS., January 6, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I received your letter of recent date in regard to prohibition in Kansas, and in reply will say that I have been on the bench in this district for more than five years. In that time every bootlegger or other person charged with the sale of intoxicating liquors that have been brought to trial in this district have been convicted, with the exception of two.

So far as my experience of prohibition goes, whisky selling has been driven out of this State, except in case of transient bootleggers. I do not believe there is a single place in my district where liquor is kept for sale, and it is a rare thing to see an intoxicating person in any of the nine counties to which my duties call me.

I am with you in your fight to uphold the honor of Kansas in the question of enforcement of prohibition law, and out here we are hoping that in the near future we may have national prohibition. Practically all the trouble that we have now is from transient men who come here from Missouri and sell cheap Missouri whisky from suit cases.

Yours, very truly,

ALBERT S. FOULKS,
Judge, Thirty-third Judicial District.

NESS CITY, KANS., January 4, 1917.

Senator WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Your letter to county attorneys of December 30 was duly received, asking for my opinion on the prohibition situation. I have been engaged in prosecuting the laws of the State for the past 10 years, and of course have found violation of various laws of the State. Owing to the peculiar conditions surrounding the liquor traffic there is perhaps more inducement to violate the prohibitory law than any other law in the State.

In the first place there is a weakness of mankind cultivated by years of habit and social custom for intoxicating beverages to be overcome. Then there is the economic influence of the great liquor interests, which is brought to bear on every community in a great many ways. The moral pervert, the selfish criminal, desires to profit from bootlegging. The foreign distillers and brewers force their wares into the State with the assistance of the United States Government. All of these things have to be fought back by the Representatives of the State and the public sentiment of the citizens. Other statutes prohibiting certain evils have not these things to contend with, but in spite of all this the prohibitory law has been and is being enforced in Kansas.

In the 10 years that I have been prosecuting in Ness County, Kans., there has not been a saloon or a joint operating. There has been occasional bootlegging, which has been easily suppressed as soon as known. At present our greatest and only hindrance to the prevention strictly of the drink habit in this county is the right under the interstate-commerce laws for the brewers and distillers to unload their wares here on express mail orders. We need two national laws to make prohibition an actual fact in Kansas. We have the State law and all the sentiment back of the law that we need, but we need a law prohibiting the soliciting of orders in the State of Kansas by mail, and we need a law making liquor shipments into the State subject to the State laws on their arrival at the State line. Surely if our national legislators knew what a valient fight the citizens of Kansas have made to make prohibition a reality and to protect its citizens against this nefarious liquor traffic they would give them such national laws as would enable them to regulate their local affairs in this particular and make prohibition an absolute fact.

Sincerely and cordially, yours,

A. W. WILSON,
County Attorney.

You may use this for any purpose.

NORTON COUNTY.

NORTON, KANS., January 5, 1917.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of yours of the 30th ultimo, concerning the operation of the prohibitory law in Kansas.

Now, I have never been able to see where the saloon is any benefit to society. It is not in any sense a social nor is it an economic asset. The fact that it is licensed in all cases where it exists shows that it must be an evil, and that it is simply tolerated. I can not see that the absence of the saloon is any detriment to any State or to any community. On the contrary, it seems to me that such an absence should be, and that it is a benefit.

I have visited other States where saloons exist, and I do not find as much drunkenness as was evident years ago, but I attribute this to the fact that the use of liquor is not as general as it has been in the past, and to the further fact that many employers forbid the use of intoxicating liquors by their employees, and such employees are compelled to refrain from the use of such liquors in order to command employment.

The very fact that there is no saloon in Kansas evidently prevents drinking that would otherwise take place, and the fact that there are men and women that have grown to maturity in Kansas without having seen a saloon is a circumstance that can not be ignored in the discussion of the question of prohibition. I hope that Congress will pass a law prohibiting brewers, distillers, and liquor dealers in other States from sending intoxicating liquors into States that have enacted prohibitory laws. I think that all such States have a right to be protected from shipments of intoxicating liquors from such other States by Congress, as Congress has the sole power so to do under the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. Especially should this be done, since so much of the territory of the United States is now subject to prohibition, which proves that the move is not a mere temporary wave and not liable to subside at any time. Prohibition seems to have taken up its permanent abode in this country, and all would do well to recognize this fact and to govern themselves accordingly.

Respectfully,

L. H. WILDER,
County Attorney.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your inquiry regarding the question as to the success of the prohibition law in Kansas beg to reply: My observation, dating back almost 35 years, would suggest that since the drug-store saloon has been legislated out of existence the people have learned to respect and enforce the prohibitory law. The very minimum of drunkenness is apparent, and while prohibition is not a positive success, yet as it exists in this locality I would say conditions compared to open saloons is 99 per cent in favor of Kansas. I am no prohibitionist and not hysterical on the question, yet must say prohibition in Kansas looks good to me.

LYNDON, KANS., January 12, 1916.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Your inquiry relative to prohibition in Kansas, addressed to me at Osage City received, and in reply to same will state that in my opinion while our prohibitory law, of course, does not entirely prohibit, it unquestionably lessens drunkenness and crime. This is a mining county, and we are troubled a great deal with "bootleggers," but a drunken man is a rare sight. I usually am in Kansas City two or three days a month on an average and will see much more evidence of drunkenness in Kansas City in two or three days than in this county in three or four weeks. I spent three years in an eastern city where prohibition was not at all popular and the conditions there as to drunkenness were the same as they are in Kansas City, Mo.

Our legislature is at this time considering measures that will mean much for absolute prohibition, namely, making the place of delivery the place of sale, but of course we will never have absolute prohibition until Congress gets actively into the game.

Any figures or statistics I could gather for you I will be only too glad to send you. Wishing you all success possible in your fight on this important question and assuring you that as far as I am able to judge the people of this State are solidly behind you, I beg to remain,

Sincerely, yours,

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,

MY DEAR SENATOR: You ask me what my opinion is as to whether the prohibition law in Kansas is a success.

You know and I know and every man who has the sense of a last year's bird's nest knows now and have known for years past that prohibition in Kansas is a success, nothing more, nothing less.

The writer is not a teetootler and never has been, I believe I am not a crank, but as a public official for the greater part of my business life, having been a resident of and a voter in this town for 33 years past, I am free to say that there never has been a law more abused by the lawless element nor a law that has been as beneficial as the very same prohibition law.

It is true there have been violations of such law, so likewise have there been violations of other laws, larceny, homicide, arson, etc., but the cold fact remains that the people are better, morally, financially, physically, and otherwise by reason of the existence of the prohibition law, and the further fact that it prohibits sale and consumption of strong drink. I do not say that "booze" is not shipped into Kansas and that considerable is used, but I do maintain that it has been reduced to a minimum. Whenever the laws can be so made as to prevent the shipment into the State none will be consumed therein.

It may sound seemingly as being a biased assertion, but as a public prosecutor and official of more than ordinary experience I make the public statement that, in my opinion, strong drink is directly and indirectly responsible for more than three-fourths of all the crime committed in the United States; that it is responsible for at least 25 per cent of the poverty and a large portion of the sickness, immorality, and degradation.

Is it possible that in this day and age any intelligent man wherever he may live will assert that "booze" is a good thing; is it possible that any man will assert that prohibition is not? One thing certain, anyone who has ever lived in a prohibition State and visited another State that did not have prohibition can quickly and readily see the benefits of prohibition.

Yours, respectfully,

GEORGE W. FINNEY,
County Attorney.

DEAR SIR: Your letter directed to the county attorney came to my hands while in office and failed to answer same, as was too busy. I was county attorney until Monday this week and have had some experience with lawbreaking in this county. We are located on the Nebraska line and much of our violations of the liquor law is caused by the importation of liquor from Nebraska by auto road. We are certainly thankful that Nebraska is dry, or will be soon.

I feel positive that the prohibition law is a success and we have many young folks who do not know what a saloon is, as they never saw one. We have a few drunks but I tell you they take to the woods quite rapidly, or their friends take them there. Kansas is overwhelmingly for prohibition and I feel sure that we could not possibly think of going back into the dark ages of high license. We are looking forward to great results from the recent decision of the Webb-Kenyon law. We certainly expect the Nation to go dry right away, and those who do not see the light enough to know that it is coming will surely be the losers. Keep up the fight, Senator, or we do not want you for the job.

COURT CHAMBERS OF JUDGE OF THE DISTRICT COURT,
Hutchinson, Kans., January 8, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Answering yours of December 30 concerning the effect of the prohibitory law in Kansas, I have to advise you that very few of the liquor cases in this district get into the district court for trial. There are frequently a number of appeals from the police court in liquor cases, but very few of them ever come to trial.

To me the prohibitory law is the same as any other law on the statute book, and I have not given it any more attention than any other criminal law. Prohibition is settled in Kansas and is as well enforced as it could be under the existing conditions, and I see no occasion for any agitation concerning the prohibitory law of Kansas. There is, of course, a great deal of liquor shipped into Kansas, and there is and probably always will be some bootlegging. So far as I know, violations of the prohibitory law are almost entirely by bootleggers, and most of the liquor cases are disposed of in police court.

I have not seen a drunken man in Kansas for so many years that I have not any recollection of when I did see one.

My time is taken up with the work of the three counties in this district, and I have spent no time in drawing any fine distinctions as to the results of the prohibitory law any more than I have the results of the laws against larceny or any other crime, and all of this talk about prohibition not being effective in Kansas is simply nonsense and not worthy of very much consideration.

With kind personal regards, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

F. F. PRIGG,
Judge Ninth Judicial District.

REPUBLIC COUNTY.

SHERIFF'S OFFICE,
Belleville, Kans., January 10, 1917.

Senator WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your letter of December 30, 1916, regarding the old question of prohibition in Kansas, I have held the office of sheriff in this county for over three years and have been closely connected with it for over six years, so believe that I am in a position to know something of what prohibition means to us as law-enforcing officers. We, being near the Nebraska line, are troubled from there more than any other place, and have looked forward to the time when it goes dry, knowing that this means a relief to us in our work. Certainly we have some drunks. But I believe that a majority of these men, who get on a drunk perhaps once a month, had we saloons would be what I would call bar flies, and continually have their system soaked, neglect their families all the time or at least a big portion of the time. True, they send and get it, mostly from Missouri, where they take men, get them drunk, and murder them, as in the Sims case, or at least supposed to have been murdered, with no question but that he was drunk. Would this have happened had Missouri been a dry State? Is there any such crime-breeding holes in the State of Kansas as you find in Kansas City, Mo.? Certainly not, and not because the people are in general worse in Missouri, but because this class of people follow where the booze is. Where you have the open saloon, your children are forced to pass by these places, see the things which they ought not to see. In Kansas if they are brought up to observe liquor, it is the fault of the parent.

We have a city of about 2,300. I do not believe that there has been a drunk in the city jail for six months. Have them once in a while, but, in my opinion, any man is better off to get on a drunk, get over it, go back to work, and attend to business and his family, and will cause less trouble and suffering than one who is continually soaked and soon becomes a confirmed drunkard. I simply say this in behalf of those few who do get tanked. We all know that if prohibition in Kansas was a failure, that if it was a menace to the people that this great agitation for national prohibition would never have developed. We also know that our neighboring States—Colorado and Nebraska—would not have voted and carried for prohibition as they did. There is no argument to it. One who will argue this with you either has an ax to grind, and such fellows can never be convinced, or he is too shallow to understand one s arguments and can not be convinced. Prohibition in Kansas is a success, and had I some of the arguments used by the opposition I might be able to point to some facts which would enable you to refute their arguments.

Being a Kansan, no doubt all of these few views I have mentioned you are familiar with, and no doubt know them as I see them, but in response to your letter submit this, whether it is of any help to you or not.

Very truly, yours,

A. T. HUNTINGTON,

OFFICE OF COUNTY ATTORNEY OF RICE COUNTY,
Lyons, Kans., January 6, 1917.

Hon. WM. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: * * * It has been my observation as a law-enforcing officer of this State, that prohibition does actually prohibit and thereby lessens crime, drunkenness, and the like, resulting morally and economically advantageous to the people of this State.

The records of any criminal court will show that since the promulgation of a prohibition law the number of prosecutions have fallen off from 50 to 60 per cent, and that can be traced directly to our stringent prohibitory laws.

It is folly to argue otherwise and against the question of national prohibition. All far-seeing men can see the necessity of such a law, and it is only a question of time until national prohibition will actually be here. Kansas has found prohibition a success as have other States who have tried it, and it only remains for a few wet States and Senators to see the light. I give you authority to use this in the Senate, should you care to do so.

Very truly, yours,

H. C. CRANDALL, County Attorney.

Senator WM. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of December 30, 1916, as to whether prohibition in Kansas is a success or a failure in preventing crime and drunkenness and also is it advantageous to the citizens of the State, morally and economically speaking.

I have been connected with the sheriff's office for the past four years, two years as a deputy and have been sheriff myself for two years, and my opinion is that prohibition in Kansas is a decided success in all the ways above mentioned.

Trusting this is the information your desire, I am,

Yours, very truly,

C. E. SCHERMERHORN,
Sheriff of Riley County, Kans.

Senator WM. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Your much appreciated letter of January 2 received, and in reply would say that I am more than proud of the fact that I reside in a dry State and only hope that soon it may be Nation-wide.

As to the question of "Does prohibition prohibit" my answer is, yes, notwithstanding that in Manhattan, a city of 10,000, including Kansas State Agricultural College students. We have an occasional drunk on the streets and in my court, but when the facts are uncovered some person posing as his friend has given it to him or a bootlegger sold it to him or he has been to Kansas City, Mo., recently and brought the liquor with him, an evil that we would be relieved of if Missouri or the Nation went dry.

You are at liberty to use this communication in the Senate if you so wish. Thanking you for the inquiry, I remain,

Yours, very truly,

ALFRED S. PORTER, Police Judge.

Senator W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your letter of the 30th of December, I trust you will pardon the delay which was unavoidable.

Prohibition does prohibit in Kansas very thoroughly. The only place it fails is when wet old Missouri sends in her "booze" and defeats our law through the interstate-commerce traffic. The bootlegger and the joint are a thing of the past in our State, barring a few towns and during the harvest season when a few bootleggers appear. The officers are promptly after these, however, and they are soon lodged in jail.

If the Nation would adopt prohibition, statistics show that there would be a decrease of about 60,000 in the number of arrests per year, 20,000 in the number of insane, and 40,000 in the number of paupers; $1,400,000,000 would be released from the purchase of booze to be invested in shoes, coats, and food. The good story is long, and it is a true story—that's the best of it.

Let's dissolve the partnership between Uncle Sam and booze. It is disgraceful alliance.

I congratulate you on your stand. Go after them with the truth. It is sure to win.

With best regards, I am,

Very truly, yours,

FRANK U. RUSSELL,
County Attorney.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I received your letter of December 30 relative to the question of prohibition in Kansas, and your inquiry as to its effect in my observation as an officer of the law.

I have been very busy in court here, and with other matters, and unable to answer the question with the fullness that its merits deserve. I came to this region in the center of the State with my parents as a small boy 40 years ago, and saw prohibition go into effect. I have lived under it ever since, have been county attorney, and interested in enforcing the law, and judge for more than 10 years in a district that stretches from the Colorado line just half way to the east line of the State. Prohibition has grown steadily in favor with the people from the time of its adoption as an amendment to the constitution in 1880 up to the present time. The measure carried by less than a majority of all the voters at the election, although having a majority of those voting on the proposition. Sentiment has changed so that now any candidate on any measure based upon opposition to prohibition receives so few votes as to be almost classified as scattering. The divided sentiment at first resulted in much hostility to the enforcement of the law and indifferent prosecution in early days. In strongly prohibition communities the law was well enforced, but in general it was not so well enforced, and in communities that were strongly hostile it was practically not enforced at all. In a number of cities and a few other communities joints ran almost exactly like saloons in license States for a number of years; but all the time sentiment was growing stronger and stronger in favor of the enforcement of the law. Gradually prosecuting attorneys and sheriffs and other officials were elected upon promises to do their duty without hesitation in the enforcement of the law. At each session of the legislature the law was strengthened in some particular leading to this better enforcement.

The courts became more and more strict in their interpretation of the spirit rather than the letter only of the constitution and statutes. Cities, which were the greatest rebels, were gradually brought into line by stringent legislation which compelled the cities to obey the State law instead of licensing saloons under one guise or another; then the State administration began to make its contribution by going into wet communities and compelling the enforcement of the law by criminal prosecutions, by injunctions against the places where the unlawful liquor business was carried on, and by ousting from office officials of cities and counties who would not do their duty. This step was perhaps the most far reaching in its influence. Then the legislature utterly forbade the sale for any purpose and thereby abolished the drug-store joint, which had been the last refuge of the traffic as a system, and by which drug stores were permitted to sell liquors for mechanical, medical, and scientific purposes, and those seeking to evade the law, both buyer and seller, were not scrupulous about the representations made as to the purpose for which liquor was wanted. Meantime, the boys and girls born and reared in the State were growing up with temperance instruction in the public schools and with training in favor of law enforcement and prohibition in many ways. Thousands of them reached maturity without having even seen a saloon or place of illicit sale of liquor. Foreign-born peoples who had brought over the attitude toward intoxicants that then prevailed in their native lands were unfriendly to the prohibitory law, but as their children grew up, these youths look at the matter more and more from the American standpoint and not that of the ancestral race. All these years prosecutions in the courts were going steadily on, and so many of the defenses and subterfuges that were interposed by law violators were successfully met and overruled by the courts from the lowest to the supreme court that at last there seems no longer any defense to suggest or any point to quibble over that has not already been determined adversely to those who wish to violate the law.

Nearly 10 years ago the joint or place of illicit sale of liquor had practically disappeared from the State, except, perhaps, in a very few congested centers or localities of particularly adverse conditions. With the passing of the joint the inducement to violate the law was largely gone, too. The profits of the chance bootlegger, who carried his stock about with him on his person, were too small and too uncertain to encourage more than a very few persons, and then of the most depraved type, to attempt to dispense liquor, nor could their operations be carried on very long until the officials found them out and prosecuted them. The bootlegger was necessarily largely a transient character and could not establish any considerable clientele in his brief sojourn.

This judicial district is an average district of the rural parts of Kansas. Ten years ago there were considerable prosecutions for the violation of the liquor law, and these have grown steadily fewer and fewer until a liquor prosecution is rather rare in any county of the district, and at the same time joints are unknown and bootleggers are scarce. Hardly anyone any longer defends or excuses the violators of this law or upholds the regular use of liquor for beverage purposes. Some money is still sent out of the State to import liquors for those who drink, but this is only trivial compared with what would be spent in the open saloon, and this likely will soon stop, too. Many thousands of inhabitants of Kansas who are under 40 years of age have never in their lives seen a legalized or illicit place of sale of intoxicating liquor or seen liquor sold, unless they have been outside of Kansas. It is a rare thing to see any person drunk, although such sometimes occurs where liquor is brought into the State. The money thus wasted elsewhere on liquor is used for helpful purposes in Kansas. There is no liquor flavor to the sermons or teachings of the church in Kansas, nor palliation or excuse for the saloon or the use of liquor. For many years politics has been wholly free from the incubus of liquor influences. In no department of business, financial, social, educational, or other activity is there any disposition on part of anyone to curry favor with the liquor interests, but instead all are united against it.

With the enfranchisement of women in 1912 the vote was strengthened in favor of prohibition, and the vote for the outlawry of the liquor traffic has been much more than doubled and has made impossible any serious thought of return to old conditions.

Very truly,

J. C. RUPPENTHAL,
Judge Thirty-third Judicial District.

SEDGWICK COUNTY.

DISTRICT COURT, EIGHTEENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT,
Wichita, Kans., January 11, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Replying to your letter of December 30, I write you that prohibition in Kansas is by no means a failure; on the contrary, it is a great success. In nine-tenths of the State it completely prohibits, and in the other one-tenth the prohibitory law is enforced and observed almost as completely as other criminal laws.

It is sometimes said that there is more drunkenness in Kansas than in States where they do not have the prohibitory law. This statement is as false as false can be and is made only by the friends of the whisky interests.

Take the State as a whole, my observation is that there is not one-tenth of the drunkenness in Kansas that there is in the wide-open States. Over 90 per cent of the children of Kansas have never seen a saloon; a large majority of the children do not know what a saloon means except from hearsay.

What little traffic there is in intoxicating liquors is outlawed, so that it is compelled to hide in secret places. The sale of intoxicating liquors is so beset with difficulties that the ordinary person would not know where to get it, and it is only the experienced drinker who does know.

The small amount of drinking that is done in Kansas is almost exclusively confined to the older men, who acquired the habit before the law was strictly enforced in the larger cities.

While Robert C. Foulston was assistant city attorney he tried 63 cases in the district court involving violations of the prohibitory liquor law. He secured 56 convictions on a trial before a jury. There were 4 acquittals and 3 disagreements.

It goes without saying that as drunkenness decreases, as it has in Kansas, the crimes that are occasioned by drunkenness decrease. Some of our business men who thought that a strict enforcement of the prohibitory law would injure our city and business have changed their views and now unhesitatingly state that by reason of the strict enforcement of the law business has improved and that people have more money to spend for the necessaries of life.

If Missouri were as dry as Kansas, most of the liquor traffic that we have now would be destroyed, because the greater part of it now comes through the State of Missouri.

This letter may sound like a political argument, but I assure you that it is not. The views herein expressed are drawn from my observation as a citizen of Kansas, as a public official engaged in administering the law, and from my observation of conditions in States where the prohibitory law is not in effect.

If you wish, you may, as requested, use this letter. I am busily engaged in the trial of cases, so that I can not give you as full information as I could do if I had more leisure.

Yours, truly,

THORNTON W. SARGENT,
District Judge.

DISTRICT COURT, EIGHTEENTH JUDICIAL DISTRICT,
Wichita, Kans., January 3, 1917.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In answering your inquiry of December 30 I will briefly reply as follows:

I am just completing my thirteenth year as district judge of the eighteenth judicial district, first division, and have probably tried in that length of time more cases than any other trial judge in the State.

Prohibition in Kansas is a great success. In the thickly populated centers the law is violated more or less, and until we have national prohibition it will be impossible to absolutely prevent the sale of intoxicating liquor.

Wichita is a city of about 65,000 people, and by far the most important commercial center of the State. Every term of court the criminal side of the docket carries a number of cases for violation of the prohibitory law. But if the question of license or prohibition should be submitted to the voters of Wichita, nine-tenths of them would be in favor of prohibition, and there is no licensed city of 65,000 in the United States that will compare with Wichita for orderliness and lack of drunkenness.

It is a rare exception to see a drunken man on the streets, and the benefits of prohibition to the rising generation are inestimable.

Respectfully, yours,

THOS. C. WILSON,
Judge Eighteenth Judicial District.

OFFICE OF MAYOR,
Wichita, Kans., January 4, 1917.

Senator WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: Your favor of December 30, 1916, is before me and contents noted. The important question in your letter is, "Is prohibition in Kansas a failure?" And, speaking from an observation and experience of 37 years in Kansas, I want to say in reply to that question that prohibition in Kansas is not a failure. And its enforcement in this community has lessened drunkenness and crime, and, while it my judgment liquor will always be used as long as it is made, the cities of Kansas and the various counties of this State have reduced it to a minimum. And in my judgment the solution of the problem is national prohibition.

As you know, there are no distilleries or breweries in this State; but the great difficulty which we encounter is the liquor which is shipped into the State from our sister State, Missouri, protected by the interstate-commerce law, and under this law the railroads can not refuse a shipment of this kind.

Our liquor in Wichita and mostly in the State, as I learn, is shipped in here from Kansas City, St. Louis, St. Joseph, and Joplin. You can say for me * * * that liquor has even been shipped into this city by automobile, coming all the way from Joplin; and if the liquor business and the manufacture and sale of the same could be curtailed in the State of Missouri it would not be at all difficult to enforce prohibition in Kansas.

In the evolution of time, if Missouri should ever become dry, Kansas would be absolutely dry.

Just at this time most of the liquor shipments which come to this portion of the State come from Kansas City, Mo.

Your position on this important question meets with my hearty approval, and you will find the people of Kansas fully in accord with you.

Very fraternally, yours,

O. H. BENTLEY,
Mayor and Commissioner of Public Safety.

OFFICE OF MAYOR,
Wichita, Kans., January 6, 1917.

Senator WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I wrote you yesterday at some length on the prohibition question, and in this letter I desire to supplement what I said yesterday.

I have undoubted information this morning from Capt. Dawson, night captain of my police force, that there are four automobiles operating from Joplin, Mo., to Wichita, hauling booze. I have further undoubted information that most of the troubles we have in Wichita now on the liquor question is brought about by operatives in the oil fields in Augusta and Eldorado, Kans., and this booze which they consume and procure in Eldorado and Augusta, Kans., is shipped into those towns from St. Joseph, Mo.

You might call the attention * * * to these facts, and he would confer a great favor on the people of this locality if he would head off the booze which is shipped from Missouri into Kansas.

Very sincerely, yours,

O. H. BENTLEY,
Mayor and Commissioner of Public Safety.

SHAWNEE COUNTY.

OFFICE OF COUNTY ATTORNEY, SHAWNEE COUNTY,
Topeka, Kans., January 5, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In answer to your letter of recent date inquiring as to my experience with reference to whether or not prohibition in Kansas is a success, will say that I am now nearing the end of my second term as county attorney of Shawnee County and have had a splendid opportunity of determining whether or not prohibition prohibits. My judgment, based on an experience of four years as prosecuting attorney, is that the prohibitory liquor law is as well enforced as any other law on the statute books, and much more stringently enforced than many of the other criminal statutes.

I have been in many other cities of about the same population as Topeka in States where saloons still exist, and I believe there is more liquor sold and drunk as a beverage in one day in such saloon cities than in Topeka in an entire year.

We have no saloons in Topeka, and no joints. A few bootleggers remain, but they are being so constantly hounded and prosecuted by the officers that their business is exceedingly small. There is less drunkenness in the cities of Kansas than in any other cities of which I have any knowledge.

Morally and economically the State has enjoyed marvelous advantages as a result of this law. The crimes which are committed are usually the result of liquors which have been ordered from Missouri and shipped in by express. This can not be prevented under the present law. Real drunkenness, as known in saloon cities, is such an unusual sight on the streets of Topeka that if a man is slightly under the influence of intoxicating liquor he is taken to the police station and charged with being drunk. In saloon cities, as a rule, a man is not arrested as a drunk unless he becomes a public nuisance.

As a result of the prohibitory liquor laws our people generally spend their money on homes for their families and the necessaries of life instead of squandering it in saloons.

My deliberate and unprejudiced opinion is that the prohibitory liquor law is the wisest and most beneficent law that has ever been adopted in the State of Kansas, and if the question was again submitted to a vote of the people prohibition would carry by practically a unanimous vote.

Yours, truly,

W. E. ATCHISON,
County Attorney.

DISTRICT COURT, THIRD JUDICIAL DISTRICT,
SECOND DIVISION,
Topeka, Kans., January 4, 1917.

Senator WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your inquiry as to the effect of prohibition in Kansas I beg to say that there is no doubt in the minds of a large majority of the people of Kansas as to the success of prohibition. I am unable to give you the figures showing the effect of the law as to drunkenness and crime or moral and economical conditions, if such indeed could be obtained with any degree of accuracy, but I know that the results have been highly beneficial. The law is now well enforced in this State, and what liquor business there is is done almost altogether by small bootleggers and through mail orders, deliveries being made mostly by express. The law has not resulted in stopping drinking altogether, but it has, in my judgment, reduced the quantity of liquor drank very largely.

Eight or ten years ago, before the brewing companies were ousted from doing business in this State there were open saloons in the larger cities, particularly along the Missouri line. These no longer exist, and practically the only violation of the law is through sales by bootleggers in small quantities. Of course it is well understood that the Kansas law does not attempt to prohibit the purchase of liquor outside of the State or the keeping of the same by individuals for their own private use. One of the greatest stumbling blocks in the way of the enforcement of the law is the facility with which liquor may be secured from a neighboring State.

There are, in my judgment, no evil effects resulting from the prohibitory law, but, on the contrary, the results have been entirely in the way of the promotion of sobriety and law observance and the saving of money for increased expenditures for the betterment of schools and homes and generally for what goes to make life more worth while. Intoxicating liquor, either in its traffic or consumption, never contributed anything toward any of these purposes and never can.

Very truly, yours,

GEORGE H. WHITCOMB, Judge District Court.

SALINE COUNTY.

SALINA, KANS., January 3, 1916.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I was very happy to see from all the newspapers that came under my sight that you were one of the leaders for the fight for prohibition. Of course, I am of the opinion that that is the way it ought to be, and I congratulate you that you did not fail to measure up to the standards of what the people of Kansas expect of their representative.

There is no question, nor can there be any successful controversy over the fact that prohibition does prohibit. In our own community here we have practically no drunkenness. Crime of every nature has decreased since the enforcement of the prohibitory law, conservatively, 50 per cent.

Bootlegging is practically a thing of the past, as it is now the practice to send these bootleggers to the penitentiary; and when that is done it practically puts an end to the bootlegger.

Economically, in our community the enforcement of the prohibitory liquor law has been the greatest boon to our growth that could possibly be conceived. Whereas a few years ago under the license system we used to have muddy streets, the poor and needy, and a crime-ridden community, we now have many miles of pavement, practically no poverty, and a decrease of crime.

One prosecutor in this State whom I had the pleasure of hearing prosecute a whisky case, to my mind, aptly expressed about the only argument that can be put forward for whisky. He said that he would concede that whisky was good for one purpose, and one only, and that was to make a person drunk.

I am very sorry that I do not have at hand the facts and figures to substantiate the above conclusions, but if at any time you deem it necessary to procure these facts or figures feel free to call upon me and I assure you beyond any question that when these facts and figures are in your possession you will see that I have been very conservative in my statements.

I sincerely trust you will be entirely successful in your fight for prohibition, and, of course, you realize you have the support of every loyal Kansan, for no loyal Kansan in this age of the world will even argue the question of prohibition as to its merits, for we are in a position to know that prohibition is the only thing. Wishing you success,

Yours, very truly, L. W. HAMNER, County Attorney.

SCOTT COUNTY.

SCOTT CITY, KANS., January 3, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have your letter of December 30 to county attorneys of Kansas.

I am in sympathy with you in the matter of prohibition, and especially in the matter of upholding the honest condition of affairs in Kansas under prohibition. Prohibition prohibits in Scott County. There is no liquor used in this county except what is privately shipped in from Kansas City, Mo. There are no sales and there are no drunks.

The writer has lived in communities where there were saloons; in recent years has traveled in wet States and knows and understands the situation in Kansas as compared with those States. There are boys and girls in Scott County, I dare say, growing to manhood and womanhood who never saw a drunken man and who never tasted intoxicating liquor and wouldn't know it if they saw it. The advantages of such a community over a wet one morally and economically are very great. The moral standard is higher. The people are better off financially and are able to educate their children and provide not only the necessities, but the luxuries of life, where with open saloons there would be want and misery. The people of Kansas buy automobiles instead of supporting saloons. The per capita of bank deposits in Scott County is greater than in any wet county on earth.

Prohibition prohibits in western Kansas, the wet advocates to the contrary notwithstanding.

Respectfully,

H. A. RUSSELL,
County Attorney.

OFFICE OF THE CLERK,

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON.
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Yours of December 30 at hand. In reply will say that I have had a great deal of experience along those lines, being mayor of Goodland, Kans., for the past 10 years. I have seen this liquor question handled both ways, with open joints and saloons, and for the past five years practically wiped out, except by shipments by express to individuals, and I think we are at least 90 per cent better off than we were before, as we practically have no poor people any more. The people in general all pay their debts better, hold their jobs better, and it is a very rare thing to see a person under the influence of liquor. While I am not a strict prohibitionist myself, I am sure against the saloons, for I know we are much better off without them. Anything further that we can benefit please let us know. You can use my opinion in any way you desire.

I am, yours, very truly,

GOODLAND, KANS., January 4, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt of your communication under date of December 30, 1916, in regard to prohibition in Kansas, and I am only too pleased to give you my views on this subject, as I am an ardent supporter of the prohibition cause.

I am only a young man, but I believe I can say with authority that prohibition is not a failure in our State. I was born and reared in Topeka, Kans., having lived there 25 years, and I was 20 years of age before I ever saw the outside door of a saloon, and then I had to go to Kansas City, Mo., to see that. I can further say that I have never seen the inside of a saloon, nor have I ever touched a drop of liquor in any shape or form, and I owe the fact that I can make that statement to prohibition in our State.

To the man that can have his liquor shipped to him prohibition does not mean much, but to the growing youth of our community prohibition is most assuredly a success. Of the 15 criminal cases brought by me in the justice court and district court of our county, 9 of them were the actions of men while in an intoxicated condition. Of course, in this western country we are confronted with this evil, and they do not seem to comprehend that they are breaking the law, but we have less insanity, higher morals, and a more progressive class of people than in towns of the same size which do not prohibit the sale of liquors.

Trusting I have been able to give some information, although perhaps not just what you desire, and assuring you that I am with you in your stand on the question and will be only too glad to aid further, I am,

Very sincerely, yours,

ELMER E. EUWER, County Attorney.

SUMNER COUNTY.

OFFICE OF MAYOR,
Caldwell, Kans., January 5, 1917.

Hon. W. H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of the 3d of December, I beg to say that I have been a resident of this city for the past 30 or more years. I am serving my third term as mayor and have served two terms as councilman. My occupation during that time has been that of a cattle buyer, and I have owned or had an interest in a meat market most of the time, and so have been in close touch with the public and in a good position to note the working of the prohibition law. I would also say that I am not a total abstainer myself, but have used liquor very moderately during my life.

My conclusions regarding prohibition formed from a long observation of its workings are that prohibition does prohibit in spite of the fact of the liquor interests' arguments to the contrary. There is no law, State or Federal, but what is broken with more of less frequency. I could point out laws in this city which are evaded oftener than the prohibition law.

Regarding the benefits of prohibition, I believe that a very large majority of the citizens of our State will tell you that it is the one law on our statute books that has done more than any other to help a large proportion of our citizens. I could point out numerous instances here of men when the saloons or joints were running whose children were poorly clothed and often hungry, and what few bills they were able to contract unpaid, who, since liquor has not been so easily attainable, are able to pay what they owe, clothe and feed their families properly, and make good citizens. Previous to the enforcement of prohibition the police court fines ran into hundreds of dollars per month, while for the whole of last year (1916) the total fines collected for all misdemeanors was $94.

In conclusion I will say that you have my hearty indorsement of your work along this line and may make any use of this letter you wish, and I hope that we will not have long to wait for a properly enforced national prohibition law.

Yours, truly,

L. M. HORTON, Mayor.

DEAR SIR: In regard to your favor of the 30th ultimo, this is somewhat of a broad question to answer, as my county has been against a wet State; but my experience in regard to crimes caused by the influence of drunkenness I have had none.

I can say that prohibition in this county is a success as far as I know in regard to the duties of this office, and I am safe to say that when Nebraska's dry law takes effect that the duties of my brother officers along the State line will be somewhat lessened.

DEAR SIR: Your favor of January 3 to hand and contents noted. You ask the old question, "Does prohibition prohibit?" I will answer by saying that the effects of prohibition is plainly apparent on every hand to every unbiased observer, making more happy homes, a better and cleaner citizenship.

Therefore, I don't consider prohibition in Kansas a failure by any means; while the accursed stuff slips in through the machinations of the whisky ring, yet there is but a very few that use it at all, and I consider prohibition is lessening drunkenness and crime, and is resulting morally and economically advantageous to our State and people, and I will say, in God's name, let the good work go on.

My DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt of your letter asking for my experience and observation regarding the prohibition question in Kansas. I am a native of Missouri, but have lived in Kansas for over 36 years, and anyone who says that prohibition in Kansas is a failure must be either dishonest, drunk, or a fool. There is not as much misery and crime caused by drunkenness in the entire State of Kansas as there is in one of the larger cities of Missouri. We have a few cases of chronic drunkenness and a small amount of bootlegging; but, taken altogether, it is not a drop in the bucket as compared with a State where the open saloon is allowed.

You are at liberty to use this letter wherever necessary and can rest assured that the good people of Kansas are with you in the fight you are making to protect the good name of our State and to keep her in the prohibition and Democratic columns where she and all other good States rightfully belong.

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter 30th ultimo asking my opinion regarding the operation of the prohibition law in this State is received. I am very glad to give you my opinion formed from a careful observation of the workings of the law in this State, and, having been raised as a boy in the State of Missouri during the time the State had open saloons, I have had the opportunity of observing the workings of both systems. I am strong for prohibition, and I believe it is a success to such a degree there is no comparison between it and an open-saloon proposition, and it seems to me there should be no question in the mind of a fair-minded man as to prohibition being a benefit to any community. I feel it is to our community, and in that I feel that I voice the sentiment of a large majority of our citizens.

In making the above statement I wish to state further that the enforcement of the prohibitory law is not all that we should like to have it. But this arises from obstacles more without the State than within the State. The protection the United States Government gives a man for shipping liquor for private use into the State, coupled with the fact we are adjacent to a State like Missouri with considerable wet territory, makes it difficult to keep liquor entirely out of this State. If it were so no man could transport liquor into this State even for private use I see no reason why the law would not be a total success, and the State far better off. I am sure that crime, poverty, and drunkenness in this State are considerably less than if we had open saloons, and very few people I have ever talked to would consider for a moment going to open saloons. Many a child in Kansas never saw a saloon and don't know what they look like. Many never saw or tasted of liquor, and if the Nation was dry in a few years it would be impossible to find a single person that ever saw a saloon. This leads me to the firm belief that our Nation ought to be a dry Nation, and I believe the greatest piece of legislation our Congress could pass would be the submission of an amendment for prohibition, as I understand national prohibition has to come through a constitutional amendment. Being a Democrat I am anxious that this privilege be given the people through a Democratic Congress and President, for I believe it will be the greatest blessing this Nation ever had.

Assuring you of my best regards and bespeaking your support of any measure that will tend to give national prohibition or local, I remain,

WYANDOTTE COUNTY.

DISTRICT COURT, WYANDOTTE COUNTY, DIVISION NO. 3,
Kansas City, Kans., January 5, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM H. THOMPSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Beg to acknowledge receipt of yours of 30th ultimo, making inquiries concerning my observations as to results of prohibition in Kansas.

Prior to about 1905 conditions were bad in all border counties and the larger counties of the State. Our city, as well as other large cities of the State, was practically licensing saloons. The fight began in about 1905 or a little earlier, which resulted in the annihilation of the protected liquor traffic.

When I first started to investigate the situation I found that most of the recent legal battles had taken place in local-option States. This went to show, to my mind, that the cry of the liquor interests to the effect that "high license" and local option were the proper methods in which to handle the situation was insincere. It showed that their position was not to respect any law.

At the time the final fight started here in 1905 in this county of Wyandotte there were approximately 100 recognized joints. At this writing no man can locate a place of any kind where liquor is being sold regularly. I mean by this that, while we have daily trouble with Missouri liquor, the only sales made locally are sales made by wagons from Missouri, bootleggers, and mushroom "blind tigers" that spring up here and there in residences, outbuildings, and the like, supplied generally with a single keg of beer or a few quarts of whisky; but the proprietors, when their business becomes too public, either quit and run away or are raided within a few hours after they commence business.

When the final battle began a committee of 15 representative business men, consisting of bankers, merchants, manufacturers, and others, waited upon me, as assistant attorney general, and requested that I immediately resign for the reason that business would be ruined by closing the joints. Every one of those men have frankly stated since that time in the public press that the elimination of the traffic in liquor was the best thing that ever happened to this locality. They testified to increased savings, increased efficiency of laborers, to prompt payment of rents, fewer suits for possession of houses. Merchants reported collections easier. No one knows better than our friend TAGGART, now in the House of Representatives, who was formerly our county attorney, that there was a marked diminution of crime, and it has continued to diminish since.

At the time mentioned, 1905, and prior thereto, it was a common occurrence to have 10 or 15 laborers in police court every Monday morning with the same story: Entered a joint Saturday evening to get a check cashed; got drunk; lost all money; kicked out and picked up by police; destitute family. That has all vanished now.

Another point I have not mentioned was the fact that the brewers made a great cry about vacant buildings in the town when they were driven out. It was but a short time until legitimate business filled all buildings vacated by the liquor traffic, and conditions never were better in the rental of business properties than to-day. On this you might get the opinion of Mr. Willard Merriam, who has the largest real estate and rental business in the State.

We appreciate your efforts to maintain the standing of Kansas as a clean, law-abiding State. Stand pat. The records bear you out.

Respectfully, yours,

WM. H. MCCAMISH,
District Judge.

P. S.: Let me add another word: We have a generation of young men and young women in Kansas but few of whom have ever tasted liquor or have seen a drunken man. Were it not for our wet neighbors abutting us at the State lines none of this generation in Kansas would have any ocular proof of conditions in wet States. I have a daughter of 19 and a son of 18 neither of whom has seen a drunkard, except those whose irregular trail was leading directly from the State line, and these are very few in the daylight hours.

While running for office recently I was introduced to a Belgian. He said that he had heard I was a prohibition crank, but that he intended to vote for me because he had lived until recently in Missouri but believed in law enforcement. He is a young man, a good mechanic, and a successful contractor, but while living in Missouri got drunk so frequently that he squandered his income and humiliated his family. Since he has lived in Kansas he has accumulated about $2,000, which he has in the bank; owns his home, and his children are in school; his family are surrounded by comforts before unknown and are happy. He says you could not induce him to reside in a wet State. Yet he still likes his liquor.

I could go on indefinitely reciting instances of men and women, too, who give like testimony. I have in mind an old German lady who says until law enforcement in Kansas her husband, a stone mason, never came home with his entire wages. Always got drunk unless she could go and get his wages.

There is no question about the fact that we are rid of the traffic and its attendant evils—slot machines, wine rooms, gambling, and fences for encouragement of crime, excepting as we get the overflow from Missouri. If Missouri, or Jackson County even, were dry, it would leave us with no problem to contend with along these lines. You can bet your money on that proposition.

The records will show that, while we have our liquor problem still with us, it is from without and not within our city.

You are at liberty to use this as you see fit.

Yours, WM. H. MCC.

SHERIFF'S OFFICE, COUNTY OF WYANDOTTE,
Kansas City, Kans., January 6, 1917.

W. H. THOMPSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I think it my duty to write you this letter and assist you in defending the name of Kansas in the noble fight she has made for prohibition—and Kansas has won the fight, too.

There was a time in Kansas when prohibition did not prohibit, but the day is gone never to return. Whisky has been the downfall of millions of good people. The saloons were closed in Kansas City, Kans., about 10 years ago. Kansas City, Kans., has prospered ever since; business rents commenced to increase when the saloons were closed here; there are no vacant business houses in Kansas City, Kans., and have not been since the saloons were closed, excepting some building that was erected in the resident district by brewery companies for the purpose of selling liquor in; at this time most of them are occupied.

I am satisfied if the records at the State prison were investigated they would show that more prisoners were sent there from Wyandotte County when liquor was sold here than since the sale of it was stopped, notwithstanding the population of our county has doubled in that time, and the number of prisoners in the county jail have decreased 100 per cent.

The employment given and goods consumed by the breweries in making intoxicants would fade into insignificance as compared to the employment and goods consumed if there was not any intoxicating liquors made or sold in the United States.

Is it better for a man to go home to his family with his stomach full of whisky and his brain on fire, with no money in his pockets, and his wife and children hiding from him, or for the same man to go home with a clear brain, with his arms full of groceries and shoes, with a smile on his face, and a happy family to meet him? These are the two ways, the former with whisky, the latter with groceries and shoes.

Yours, truly,

R. L. HINCH, Sheriff.

Now, if prohibition has been such a bad thing for Kansas, as claimed by the opposition, how could we get 100 honorable men charged with official responsibility, located in every section of the State, to write such letters as these? I will say that in all the responses there was not a single discordant note and not a word or a line tending in any way to justify the argument of the opposition. When it comes to actual practice, there is not a single argument against prohibition that can be substantiated by facts.

If prohibition has been such a bad thing, why is it that the sentiment for it has been growing so rapidly until now it extends everywhere? Things which are a detriment to society and humanity soon die out rather than extend to other communities. Although in the beginning Kansas stood as the one great oasis in the old American desert, why is it now that on three sides—in Oklahoma, Colorado, and Nebraska—the people have adopted the same identical law, and even in Missouri wherever the border counties touch Kansas, except those containing large cities, every county and city is dry under the local-option law of that State, and the whole State at the last election, except for the county of St. Louis alone, would have adopted complete prohibition?

These letters answer every argument that has ever been made against prohibition in Kansas. They show that the farther you get out into the State and away from wet territory, drinking and drunkenness and other crimes have grown less and less, and our happiness and prosperity greater and greater. They show that the only difficulty we have ever had with the enforcement of the law has been in preventing shipments from outside wet territory. This has been the experience of all dry communities. It is the difficulty experienced by the dry counties of Missouri and other States under the local-option laws. The only thing, therefore, that has interfered with the complete operation of the law, and the best effects therefrom, has been the liquor in wet localities, which all points conclusively to the real remedy which is to prevent the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor everywhere.

Let us therefore adopt this amendment. Do this, Senators, and we will have taken the greatest step forward in the betterment of our citizenship that has been taken at any one time since the foundation of the Government. Do this and we will have wiped away from the women and little children more tears, blood, and suffering than any other step that it would be possible to take at this time. Do this and we will have contributed more to the final success and victory in the present cruel war than any other one action we can take, and will thereby greatly benefit not only the people of this country but the people of the entire world.

Mr. THOMPSON subsequently said:

I ask permission that certain letters to which I referred in my address this afternoon be made a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Kansas will be granted.

Mr. THOMPSON. Also, instead of the clipping from the Kansas City Star, which was objected to, I ask permission to refer to a clipping from the Kansas City Post of June 19, 1917, concerning the same matter. It has already been printed in the RECORD, at page 4534, proceedings of the House, RECORD of June 29, and I ask that the portions thereof concerning the bringing of suit by Mr. Conwell be made a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the pending joint resolution, which I desire may be read, printed, and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert a new section, to be known as section 2, and to read as follows:

SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, on or before the 1st day of July, A. D. 1923.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in order that there may be no mistake, I move that the portion of the remarks of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] just made that reflected in any way upon a Member of this body or a Member of the other House of Congress be expunged from the RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. Who is going to decide as to that?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Nebraska asks me who is going to decide. I will leave it to the Senator from Kansas to decide, and if, when the matter has been printed in the RECORD, it appears that there are remarks that other Senators think are reflections upon Members of either body, then they can move to expunge those particular parts of the remarks at a later day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from Utah does not press the motion now?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I do.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will pardon the Chair for a moment. The Chair understood that the Senator from Utah did not desire to press his motion.

Mr. SMOOT. I made the motion, and I want the question put upon it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair begs the Senator's pardon. The Chair understood the Senator to have withdrawn the motion.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I desire the Senator from Utah to wait until the senior Senator from Kansas returns to the Chamber.

Mr. THOMPSON entered the Chamber.

Mr. CURTIS. I notice the senior Senator from Kansas has now returned to the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. I will now repeat my motion, in order that there may be no question about the Senator from Kansas understanding what it is. I have moved, I will say to the senior Senator from Kansas, that all portions of the remarks just made by him reflecting upon any Member of this body or of the other House be expunged from the RECORD; and I will leave the question as to what should be expunged to the Senator from Kansas himself.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I have no objection to that, but I do think the rules were more rigorously enforced against the Senator from Kansas than they have ever been enforced against any other Senator since I have been in the Senate, or was against the Senator from Utah, who has used even harsher language to-day than has the Senator from Kansas, relative to the other House. It is not, however, my intention to reflect upon any Representative or upon any Senator more than simply to show their particular official acts, which are matters of record, and I do not desire to say anything as a conclusion therefrom which would reflect upon such Member's honor or integrity.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Kansas is mistaken in the statement that the rule has been applied to him more strictly than to other Senators in this body.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have been here about five years, and this is the first time I have ever seen the rule so applied.

Mr. SMOOT. I have seen the rule applied to Members of this body, and the Senator offending has been ordered by the Chair to take his seat. Certainly that was not enforced against the Senator from Kansas to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I was unable to be in the Senate and to hear all of the discussion by the Senator from Kansas, but I certainly do not care to vote for a motion as to which I know nothing. If it is not agreeable to the Senator from Kansas to let portions of his remarks be expunged, I shall certainly not vote for the motion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I simply desire to say to the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. I simply desire to say to the Senator from North Dakota that all in the world that the Senator from Kansas did was what has been done here every day. I called attention to the action of a Representative in the other House introducing into the RECORD, under the pretense of extending his remarks, a reflection against the people of Kansas and the operations of the prohibitory law in particular.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not think the Senator from Kansas understood me. What I meant to say was that, unless it is agreeable to the Senator from Kansas, I am unwilling to vote for the motion to expunge from the RECORD anything the Senator from Kansas has said.

Mr. THOMPSON. With the statement that it be left to the Senator from Kansas, I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. STONE. The parliamentary inquiry is, what is pending now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has moved to expunge from the RECORD any portion of the remarks made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] that reflected upon any Member of the Senate or upon any Member of the House, the matter to be left to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. STONE. Does the motion leave it to the Senator from Kansas?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands it does.

Mr. STONE. Then what is the need of debating it?

Mr. THOMPSON. I expect to do that in any event, if the Senator from Missouri pleases.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, in justice to myself I desire to say that I came into the Chamber and heard the Senator, as I thought, attacking some Member of the House of Representatives. I do not know who he is and can not now recall his name. The Senator says this is the first time that this rule has been invoked. I have heard it frequently invoked, but I have not for a long time heard a Senator reflect on a Member of the House of Representatives. It is a dangerous thing to do, for the reason that if we do not preserve our dignity in that respect and keep the rules, what is there to keep Members of the House of Representatives from attacking Members of this body? The rule to which I have referred applies both to the House and to the Senate, and I simply called attention to it in order, as I thought, to protect the Senator from Kansas, and suggested that, although he might have just cause for so reflecting, this was not the place to reflect on a Member of the other House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, before that motion is put, I should like to state that I do not see why there should be such a motion made when the Senator from Kansas has stated that he expects to expunge from the letters and from his remarks any reflections which may have been made. The motion which has been made is going to leave it to him in any event, and I do not see why, when he has stated that he would take such action, that it is necessary that any motion at all should be made under the rule which has been cited.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I withdraw the motion. The Senator from Kansas was out of the Chamber at the time I made the motion. I did not want the occasion to pass without action at the time; but now that the Senator from Kansas has stated that he will expunge the objectionable matter, I am perfectly willing to withdraw and do withdraw the motion, with the understanding that the Senator from Kansas will do just as he has said he will do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Utah is withdrawn.

Mr. STONE obtained the floor.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, my colleague [Mr. REED] desires to make some observations, and for that purpose I yield the floor to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is recognized.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I would not take a moment of the time of the Senate to reply to anything said by the Senator from Kansas but for the fact that he has repeated with some deliberation a statement that was sent over his State at the time of a little colloquy which took place about the 19th of December. That colloquy originated in an innocent inquiry which I propounded to the Senator with reference to conditions in Kansas City, Kans. I did not expect it to provoke any discussion, because I thought I would elicit a frank statement from the Senator from Kansas in the way of an admission concerning the matters about which I inquired, for it seemed to me that there could be no reasonable dispute about them. However that may be, and passing it by as wholly immaterial at this time, I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas to the fact that he has to-day repeated the statement that was sent throughout the State of Kansas that I charged that at present, or on the 19th day of December, 1916, "there were more drunkards to the square acre in Kansas than in any place I ever was."

It is well understood that newspaper accounts when they are passed by the reporter who takes them in the Senate to the telegraph editor, and then may be edited and reedited a dozen times before they finally get into print, may display some inaccuracies, and such inaccuracies are therefore pardonable; but it is hardly pardonable that the Senator from Kansas should in the Senate repeat that statement which is absolutely inaccurate.

All that the Senator from Kansas had to do was to turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to see what I did say, and he must have turned to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in order to get my language, and if he did turn to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in order to get my language this is what he read. I read from page 540:

> I do not know what effect the prohibitory law may have had in Kansas as a whole, but I want to say to the Senator that no man can candidly claim that there was any real enforcement of that prohibitory law for many, many years after it was passed. I remember a good many years ago trying a case in a court, which was presided over by the Senator's distinguished father, I think, in a small town in Kansas.

I had not named the town yet. The Senator from Kansas said—and I read from the RECORD:

> Mr. THOMPSON. Hiawatha.
> Mr. REED. At Hiawatha. It seemed to me that there was not a lawyer at the bar who was not a common drunkard, and they had prohibition there, but it did not prohibit.
> Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?
> Mr. REED. Yes.
> Mr. THOMPSON. The Senator will acquit me of that. He knows I had not been admitted to the bar at that time. That was in 1891, when I first became acquainted with the Senator from Missouri, and we have been good friends ever since.

I pause here to interrupt the thread of what I was discussing to remark that it was somewhat remarkable that the Senator from Kansas at that time and place did not deny my statement with reference to the condition of the bar of the court of his own town where he lived; but, instead of declaring that my statement was a base slander, he asked me to please exclude him from the list of the bar, and pleaded his own immunity upon the ground that he was then so young that he had not been admitted to the practice—I mean the practice of the profession, not the practice of the bar.

Since this remark made in the heat of debate has been passed around, and because I would not do injustice to any set of men, let me say that I did not say that all of the bar were drunkards, but I said it seemed to me they were drunkards. I was sorry after that——

Mr. THOMPSON. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, that is the language I used to-day.

Mr. REED. Yes; but I am coming to the Senator's other language. I was sorry, after stating it, that I had made the statement, because, no matter what the habits were of the members of the bar there in that little town over 20—I think 25—years ago, I ought to have forgotten and let them pass into sweet oblivion covering them with the dust of forgetfulness, and I am willing to let the statement rest there so far as the conditions of the Hiawatha bar were concerned.

I pass on now to the matter that I rose to speak about. What I have read is preliminary; and notice I was referring to a condition that prevailed 26 or 27 years ago. Following what I have just read, I continued:

> Mr. REED. The Senator was not at that time a lawyer, and I am stating this to cast no aspersions upon the Senator's State or town. I had a good deal of business for a good many years in Kansas, and I say now, without desiring to reflect upon the Senator's State, that there were more drunkards to the square acre in Kansas than in any place I ever was, and that, too, under a prohibitory law.

To what time was I referring, Senator THOMPSON—to the 19th day of December or to years before? But I read on:

> Mr. THOMPSON. Would the Senator object to stating how many years ago that was?
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?
> Mr. REED. My travels back and forth there——
> The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield.
> Mr. REED. Oh, no; I yield.
> Mr. THOMPSON. The time to which the Senator refers was 25 years ago, was it not?
> Mr. REED. Oh, no; not that far back. Formerly I frequently had legal business in the State of Kansas.

Then there was an interruption—

> Mr. OWEN. May I suggest——
> Mr. REED. I will ask the Senator to wait until I have concluded this sentence. That business dropped off very largely something like 12 or 15 years ago, and I have not been there very much since. I am going to state this case fairly before I get through, so that I do not think the Senator from Kansas can object to it; but the facts ought to be stated. Did the Senator from Oklahoma desire to ask me something?
> Mr. OWEN. I merely desired to remove the doubt as to whether the period referred to by the Senator from Kansas, when the Senator from Missouri was practicing law in Kansas, was 45 years ago or 55 years ago?
> Mr. REED. Well, hardly that long ago. It was about the period when the Senator from Oklahoma was rising to national fame; and I presume that is not more than 20 years back.

Mr. President, the whole of the context and the whole of the statement makes it plain, so plain that the fool, though a wayfaring man, could not err therein, if he would pause to read it, that I was talking about a condition that existed in the State of Kansas many years back.

Furthermore, later on in my remarks I said that the law was being much better enforced in the State of Kansas. What I was saying with reference to the State of Kansas was largely in reply to attacks that were made upon my own State. So that when the Senator circulates the speech which he made this afternoon in his campaign, which I take it is the purpose for which his speech was made, I want him to put into that speech simply the fact that the statement I made with reference to the condition as to drunkenness in the State of Kansas related to a time many years ago. I want him to say that I further said, speaking of the condition of the joints—and the Senator will find the language at page 540 of the RECORD of December 19, in the left-hand column, near the bottom—now, I was speaking of Kansas City, Kans., and of the fact that the joints and the gambling houses had been driven there from the State of Missouri and had there taken refuge. I said this:

> Mr. REED. Until about five or six years ago, or perhaps seven years ago, they had innumerable whisky and beer joints in Kansas City, Kans.

Will the Senator from Kansas on his honor deny it? I pause for a reply.

I continue:

> They openly defied the law in the city of Leavenworth. The hotel bars and saloons were as open there as they were in the State of Missouri—

Will the Senator from Kansas deny that fact? I pause long enough for a reply—> and drunkenness was a very prevalent disease or habit, or whatever it is called. Five or six years back they elected a man attorney general of the State who undertook to enforce these laws. He had a desperate time in accomplishing his undertaking, but he prosecuted the "joints." The open saloon, I think, he absolutely eradicated. Finally the law was so enforced that open gambling was stopped, and I think they have a very fair condition of public and private morals in the State of Kansas; but they have as much drunkenness, in my opinion, in that State to-day as they have in the State of Missouri, and I think a little more.

And upon that statement I unqualifiedly stand. So that instead of saying that on the 19th day of December this condition existed in Kansas, I gave to Kansas the credit of having in recent years enforced her prohibitory law with reasonable success.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. THOMPSON. It has been longer than five or six years. I think the Senator from Missouri will admit that.

Mr. REED. I do not think it has been longer with reference to Kansas City, Kans.——

Mr. THOMPSON. It has been something like 12 years.

Mr. REED. And I do not think it has been very much longer with reference to Leavenworth. It is possible, however, in the flight of time, that I may be a year or two short on the exact time. The fact is, I have not missed my drinks in Kansas, and have not been worried about the condition of dryness in that State; but I do know in a general way in regard to the conditions. Now, there is no use in keeping up a controversy forever, because if the Senator from Kansas were to stand here and talk forever he could not convince the people of his own State that in Topeka, Kans., and in Leavenworth, Kans., and in Kansas City, Kans., for many years there was not open violation of the prohibitory law.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. REED. In just a moment. Let me conclude my statement.

Mr. CURTIS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Neither would any fair man state that at the present time, or for several years back, the effect of the prohibitory law had not been to curtail very greatly the open selling, at least, of liquor in the State of Kansas, and perhaps its consumption. I do not know what is sent in by private shipments.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to state to the Senator that in the city of Topeka the open saloons were closed in February, 1885, and have not been open there since. I was the county attorney who closed the saloons in that city and kept them closed for the four years I was county attorney, and I have lived in that city ever since.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, I really do not want to get into these personal disputes, but I happen to know that I went to the city of Topeka on some business, and I know that it was after the time that the Senator states, although I could not state the year, and I know that the hotel bar was running at that time.

Now, I did not visit the towns looking for saloons. I know, and the Senator from Kansas who now has the floor will certainly not deny the fact, that for many years in Kansas City, Kans., you had the open saloon, many years after the prohibitory law took effect.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, we might as well meet this question here as anywhere else, and fight it out to-day. I say to the Senator and I say to the country that in February, 1885—and my recollection is that it was on the 14th day of February—the last open saloon was closed in the city of Topeka. I was county attorney, and enforced the law myself. It was the first time that the law had been enforced in that city.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator for the admission. That is all I want—just that admission.

Mr. CURTIS. It was the first time, in 1885. They were kept closed for the four years that I was county attorney. I lived there and practiced law until I was elected to Congress in 1892, and have lived there ever since; and I state that while I was county attorney and while my successors were in office there was not an open saloon in that city. I will say that there were a few joints and some bootleggers up to five or six years ago.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator enlighten us as to when the prohibitory law was enacted?

Mr. CURTIS. In 1881.

Mr. REED. And the Senator began to enforce it in 1885?

Mr. CURTIS. In the city of Topeka.

Mr. REED. And up to that time the law had never been enforced in the State, the Senator just said.

Mr. CURTIS. I did not say in the State; I said in that city.

Mr. REED. Very well, I thought the Senator said in the State of Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I know nothing about the enforcement of the law in different parts of the State.

Mr. REED. The Senator need not get at all excited about this matter.

Mr. CURTIS. I am not excited. I want the Senator to know the facts; that is all.

Mr. REED. I am giving his town a pretty clean bill of health. I had left Topeka and had gone to Kansas City, Kans., and the statement I was making was in regard to Kansas City, Kans.; but I notice now that the Senator from Kansas, and from Topeka, Kans., does not claim that there were not plenty of joints in Topeka for many years after 1885.

Mr. CURTIS. Oh, I did not say there were plenty. I said there were a few joints and bootleggers there until a few years ago.

Mr. REED. Yes. Now, that is all I ever said about your town of Topeka.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator said there was an open bar in the hotel.

Mr. REED. I said there was an open bar in the hotel, to my certain knowledge, on the occasion that I was there attending the Federal court.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not think that can be correct, if the Senator was there since 1885.

Mr. REED. The Senator may not think so, but I know when I see a thing, and I saw many gentlemen patronizing it; but that is immaterial. Any man that would claim that Kansas was made absolutely dry by the prohibitory law would not be a frank man; and if there was a condition of failure to enforce for many years, and if you have finally come to a fair condition of enforcement, there ought to be no quarrel about this matter.

But I was talking about Kansas City, Kans., a moment ago, when I was interrupted. It seems that the only difference between the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and myself is that he thinks that was probably eight or nine years ago. I will let him have the benefit of that.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON. The sheriff of the county states in his letter that it was 12 years ago that they began the enforcement of the law.

Mr. REED. Oh, well, it was not 12 years ago. It is not that long ago. I live across the line. I know the conditions that existed. I read the newspapers. The Senator from Kansas himself produced here in the Senate a few months ago, at the time of or shortly after this colloquy, records from the courts showing where the attorney general had brought his injunction proceedings; and, of course, he did not bring the injunction proceedings unless there was something to enjoin. Now, there is not any use trying to fudge on this matter. The truth is, you had a very poor enforcement of the prohibitory law for many years, and the truth now is that in the last few years you have had a pretty fair enforcement. That is what I said before, and it is all here in this RECORD.

The only reason I rose, however, was to have the Senator, when he sends out his campaign speech, put into the speech the fact that I was speaking of a time about 10 or 12 or 20 years ago and not of recent times. If he will do that, I am content. I have no desire to say anything against the State of Kansas. It has many good people in it, and I said so in my speech. I think I said of and concerning Kansas as many pleasant things as the Senator has ever said.

Now, there is one thing, since the Senator is so supersensitive, that I ask him to correct on his own account. On the 19th day of December, 1916, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] said:

> I am glad to have the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma. When Missouri is included we shall all be satisfied.

That was in reply, and is merely thrown in for the context.

Mr. THOMPSON. What page is the Senator reading from?

Mr. REED. The Senator will find it on page 538, in the right-hand column. [Reading:]

> If I were asked what law has been the greatest educational benefit to my State, I would have to answer the prohibitory liquor law. When that law went into effect the illiteracy of the State was 49 per cent. It has decreased since that time to less than 2 per cent—the lowest of any State in the Union, excepting one.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. REED. In a moment.

Mr. THOMPSON. But I can save a good deal of time. That statement has been corrected in the RECORD. It was corrected the following day. It should have been 4.9 per cent. It was merely a typographical error.

Mr. REED. I followed that with this statement:

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Kansas if I heard him aright——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMPSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Did the Senator from Kansas state that before the prohibitory law was passed in Kansas the illiteracy was 49 per cent?

Mr. THOMPSON. My understanding is that prior to 1880 the illiteracy was 49 per cent.

Mr. REED. Oh, there never was a community in America which was so ignorant as that—not even in Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me?

Mr. REED. I will permit the Senator in a moment, when I finish this sentence.

Now, Mr. President, if the Senator corrected it the next day, I am glad of it for the sake of Kansas; but I want him, when he sends out his campaign speech, to insert that at the same time I was making the statements with reference to Kansas he said that the degree of illiteracy was 49 per cent, and that I came to the defense of Kansas and repudiated the statement, and set the Senator right—a fact, however, which he was not willing to accept at that time, but which, upon looking up the records a day or two later, and finding that I was correct, he somewhat reluctantly conceded in the RECORD.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I stated in the RECORD the day after the Senator made his speech, I believe, that I was absent during his remarks, and I put the correct figures in the speech which I delivered—and I think the Senator was present—showing that the percentage of illiteracy in Kansas was only 5.6 per cent.

Mr. REED. I understand, of course, that it was a mistake; but I want the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], when he sends out his campaign speech, to tell the people of Kansas how I valiantly came to their defense on the memorable 19th day of December.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] has proposed an amendment to the pending joint resolution which provides in substance that the States shall act upon the joint resolution within a period of six years. I think that amendment ought to be agreed to, and I shall vote for it; but I do not rise at this time to discuss that, nor to discuss the joint resolution itself as reported from the Committee on the Judiciary. I have it in mind in due time on to-morrow, and after the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio has been acted upon, to propose another amendment to the pending joint resolution upon which I shall ask the judgment of the Senate, and it is upon that amendment that I desire to address the Senate this afternoon. I must do that this afternoon, or not at all, under the limitations of the unanimous-consent agreement.

The amendment I have in mind to propose will be in substance, though it may not be when offered in the exact phraseology I am going to read, namely:

The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation; but this article shall not be enforced until the Congress shall have made provision for the ascertainment and payment of damages resulting from the enforcement of the same.

It is to that proposition that I wish to address myself.

AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AND PEOPLE ALWAYS FOR PROTECTION OF PROPERTY RIGHTS.

Mr. President, from the commencement of our Government our people in both Federal and State Constitutions have declared for the protection of property, and that private property should not be taken or damaged by public act without just compensation.

This is a fundamental principle of our social organism and law, and everyone growing up as an American or living under our Government absorbs the idea as being a vital part of American life. To the layman and the lawyer alike it is common knowledge. All classes understand that, and accept it and indorse it as a fundamental principle of our institutions and our Government. This principle is founded on that rule of right so well stated by an eminent American, when he said "that the demands of absolute and eternal justice forbid that any private property legally acquired and legally held should be spoliated or destroyed in the interest of public health, morals, or welfare without compensation."

And it has been written of this principle by a great judge:

This power to take private property reaches back of all constitutional provisions, and it seems to be a settled principle of universal law that the right of compensation is an incident to the exercise of that power; that the one is so inseparably connected with the other that they may be said to exist not as separate and distinct principles but as parts of one and the same principle.

And, again, in speaking on this question the Supreme Court says: "And in this there is a natural equity which commends it to everyone. It in no wise detracts from the power of the public to take whatever may be necessary for its use, while, on the other hand, it prevents the public from loading upon an individual more than his just share of the burden of government, and says that when he surrenders to the public something more and different from that which is exacted from other members of the public a full and just equivalent shall be returned to him." (Vol. 37, L. Ed. U. S. R., p. 467.)

This principle is enunciated in our National Constitution in the sentence that no person shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

THE PROPOSED CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT IS A DAMAGE TO AND DESTRUCTION OF PROPERTY NOW LEGALLY HELD AND LEGALLY USED CONTRARY TO THE SPIRIT OF OUR LAW AND GOVERNMENT.

It is important to keep clearly in mind the fact that the business and property affected by this proposed amendment is in all States where laws legalize the business and protect the property and capital invested and protect the right of the workman to labor in the industry.

The proposal is for the Federal Government by constitutional amendment to override the wishes of the people of the States wherein the business is conducted and put an end to it.

There is no doubt that the adoption of this amendment would destroy the business of those engaged in the malt, vinous, and distilled liquor industries; no doubt that it would render valueless for the present purpose for which it is used millions of dollars' worth of property; no doubt that it would take away the right to earn a living of thousands of men who have learned the business under the sanction if not by the invitation of the laws of the State and Federal Governments, and who now have the protection of their respective State laws and State governments of their right to labor in these industries and earn a living thereby. This business, this property, the occupation of these thousands of men, all now protected and legalized by State laws, it is proposed to destroy by an act of the Federal Government without compensation and over the objection and against the wishes of the people of the States where the business is carried on. But it will doubtless be said that this property and business and the right to labor therein are not taken physically by the proposed amendment; that there is no direct taking or destruction in the physical sense; that there is no actual physical conversion of the property or the business; but in Wallace, Thirteenth United States Reports, pages 166 and 167, a Supreme Court justice answered this suggestion as follows:

It would be a very curious and unsatisfactory result if, in construing a provision of constitutional law always understood to have been adopted for protection and security to the rights of the individual as against the Government and which has received the commendation of jurists and statesmen and commentators as placing the just principle of the common law on that subject beyond the power of ordinary legislation to change or control them, it shall be held that if the Government refrains from the absolute conversion of real property to the uses of the public it can destroy its value entirely, can inflict irreparable and permanent injury to any extent, can in effect subject it to total destruction without making any compensation, because in the narrowest sense of that word it is not taken for the public use. Such a construction would pervert the constitutional provision into a restriction upon the rights of the citizen as those rights stood at the common law, instead of the Government, and make it an authority for the invasion of private rights under the pretext of the public good which had no warrant or authority in the laws or practices of our ancestors.

The modern doctrine of the courts as to when the right to compensation exists has been defined in this wise:

Any substantial interference with private property which destroys or lessens its value or by which the owner's right to its use and enjoyment is in any substantial degree abridged or destroyed is in fact and in law a taking in the constitutional sense to the extent of the damages suffered, even though the title and the possession of the owner remains undisturbed. (Lewis on Eminent Domain, 3d ed., Vol. I, sec. 55, pp. 56–57, 67; 28th Utah R., p. 211.)

I conclude, therefore, it is clear that, if this loss and damage which will be inflicted by passage by Congress and adoption by the States of this amendment were inflicted by a congressional act, the provisions of the Federal Constitution prohibiting destruction and damage of private property and business without compensation would apply, and if the congressional legislation did not itself provide compensation, under the decisions of our courts and the policy of our Government, the public faith would require those suffering loss by the congressional act should be recompensed according to the due process of the law of the land. The records of our Government and courts abound in cases of this sort where legislation or other governmental act has damaged or destroyed property or business, and always where property has been legally held and used and business legally conducted the Government has rendered just compensation to those injured. One comparatively recent case of damages paid by the Government for loss caused by enactment of a statute by Congress is what is known as the Sugar Case, reported in the forty-first volume, Law Edition of United States Reports, page 215. In this and all similar cases the Government in recognizing the obligation to compensate has acted on the theory that it was and is a cardinal principle of our institutions that private property, legally used and legaliy held, shall not be destroyed or damaged, either by public or private act, without a right to compensation. The business of the malt, vinous, and distilled liquor industries is legalized now by the laws of the States where carried on, and the property and capital invested therein are protected by the laws of those States. The business is legally conducted, the property is legally held and legally used, and the workman has the protection of the law in his right to labor therein. If a private citizen in one of these States legalizing these industries by any act of his interferes with the business, destroys the property, or injures it or damages it or interferes with the right of the workmen to labor therein, the citizen so doing must answer in the courts of the land for his act, and unless legal defense can by him be established he must compensate for all losses he may have inflicted. Why is this law of compensation enforced against the citizen who might thus damage the property or the workmen employed in the industry? What is the principle on which the law of compensation, as embodied in our Constitution, is founded? The answer is that it is morally and legally wrong to take private property or to injure the same by public or private act without compensation, and, as said by the Supreme Court of the United States, Seventy-first United States, page 120:

> The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people equally in war and in peace and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances.

Now, if a private citizen may not damage or destroy the property legally used and legally held in this business, and may not prevent the workmen from earning a living in these industries without responding in compensation for any loss incurred by his act, are the people of the United States in their collective capacity as a Federal Government to be justified morally or excused from doing what the Government itself compels by its constitutional mandate its citizens to do—that is, respond in damages and compensate for destruction of business carried on with the sanction of the law and damage to property legally held and legally used?

But the answer doubtless will be that this is a constitutional amendment and not a congressional enactment, and that while perhaps it is true that if the damage was inflicted by congressional act compensation should be paid, yet by an amendment to the Constitution it can be done without incurring responsibility for compensation. Waiving but not conceding, the question whether or not it can be legally done without compensation even by constitutional amendment, and admitting for the sake only of the present discussion the power exists, does it change the principle involved because we destroy the property and the business by an amendment to the Constitution instead of by congressional act? If the loss should be inflicted by congressional act, there is no doubt in my mind that the right to compensation therefor would exist. The damage to property in these industries now legally held and used in these States is the same whether the loss is inflicted by congressional act or by constitutional amendment. Only recently in this body the question of the right to destroy and damage this class of property without compensation was discussed, and, as I remember, it was practically conceded by all if damage ensued on congressional action compensation must be paid according to the terms of the Constitution. On what theory is the constitutional proposition founded which would exempt it from the just principle which prevents destruction of private property by public act without compensation? It is the demand of absolute and eternal justice that private property legally acquired and legally held shall not be spoliated or destroyed in the interest of public health, morals, welfare, or any other public interest without compensation. This is the sound proposition on which the American idea of legal protection to property is grounded. Does it change the principle or the morality of the act because you do the damage by a constitutional amendment instead of by a congressional enactment? Now, the Federal Constitution protects the citizen from the acts of the State or the acts of a fellow citizen which would destroy his private property legally held and used without compensation therefor. This is one of the great bulwarks of right in our organic law. Now, it is proposed by this amendment to put into this same Constitution alongside of this provision that protects the private citizen in his property and his business and his right to labor a provision whereby the people of the United States in their collective capacity as a Federal Government would destroy hundreds of millions of dollars of property now legally owned and legally used under the laws of the States where located without any compensation whatever for the damage done. If the principle in our Constitutions, National and State, declaring no person shall be deprived of liberty or property without due process of law, nor private property taken by public act without just compensation, is correct, and if it is right that private property legally held and used shall not be destroyed by governmental action without compensation, then why is it not sound governmental policy to say that this private property belonging to these industries now legally held and used should not be destroyed by governmental policy or change of policy without compensation? When the tariff laws were changed so as to injuriously affect the sugar industry Congress promptly met the loss sustained by providing compensation, and the Supreme Court upheld the act.

It is true Congress can as a war-emergency act authorize the taking of private property for public use, but if no provision is made in the act for compensation the Government is in honor bound to pay the owner the value of his property as determined according to the due process of the law of the land. But certainly it will not be contended that this is a war measure. The men who have invested their money in the business and those who have spent their lives learning to labor and are laboring in these industries were permitted, if not invited, by the laws of the United States Government and the various States and cities of the country to go into the business, and approximately two-thirds of the voters of this Republic now live in States whose laws sanction and legalize this business.

Has the Government of the United States the moral right, in violation of the spirit of the Constitution and of its historic policy, to destroy millions of dollars of property invested in the business that for years it has recognized as legal and which now is a legitimate business in the States where it is carried on? Granted for the time being that the Government of the United States is supreme in this matter, can it afford to do this? It must be admitted it is practical confiscation to deprive citizens of property and values legally acquired without redress or compensation. In most of the larger States the business is legalized and the property and money invested protected and the workman protected in his right to labor and earn a living in this industry, and now it is proposed by an act of the Federal Government to destroy hundreds of millions of dollars of property of the citizens of these States and deprive hundreds of thousands of the citizens of their occupation against the will of the people of these sovereign States, and all without offering any compensation for the loss sustained. This amendment is advocated on the theory that it is conducive to public welfare, health, safety, and good order, and therefore confiscation without compensation is justified; but the whole theory of our Government, State and National, is founded on the proposition that confiscation of property without compensation is wrong in morals and in principle. This must be admitted. Now, if that is true, we have this condition: That it is proposed in order to promote the public welfare, health, safety, and good order, an immoral and wrongful public act—I use the word "immoral" in the sense that whenever the government of a State does a wrong thing against its citizens it is fundamentally wrong and, therefore, fundamentally immoral—must be committed by our Government of taking and destroying property without compensation and against the wishes of the people of the States wherein the confiscated property is located.

To emphasize, I repeat that if an individual citizen in any of the licensed States could by his act render useless property used in these industries he would have to respond in damages, and the owner would be compensated. Now, is it any less wrong, morally or legally, for the Federal Government to destroy or injure this property in a licensed State without compensation than it would be for a private citizen so to do? In its last analysis the contention in behalf of this amendment without compensation reduces itself to the proposition that it is justifiable to commit a moral wrong, if not a legal wrong, and to violate the spirit, if not the letter, of the Federal and every State Constitution, in order to promote public welfare. Of this contention I will say as the Supreme Court said of a suggestion that war emergencies might suspend constitutional protection:

> No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man * * *. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false.

In my judgment it would be better to make the record of our Government in the manner of dealing with the question of loss and damage ensuing in the adoption of this amendment square itself with all our prior governmental history and policy, and square itself with the inexorable law of right and justice, and prevent our Government from committing a great moral wrong of this character.

ECONOMIC SIDE OF QUESTION.

Capital now invested in brewing business is estimated at about	$750,000,000
Distilling business, about	80,000,000
Wine making, about	30,000,000
Malting, about	60,000,000
The amount invested in the retail trade is estimated at about	421,601,380

There are employed in the retail and manufacturing branches, including owners and proprietors, probably 800,000 persons.

Indirectly engaged in the business and dependent on allied business industries there are additional persons employed of approximately 200,000 persons.

Based on my information, I think this is a conservative estimate of the capital invested and the number of men occupied in these industries.

Mr. President, at this time, with the disturbed conditions produced by war, to wipe out all this property without compensation, thereby inflicting $1,000,000,000 loss on private citizens and at the same time deprive 1,000,000 of our citizens of their means of livelihood in the manner proposed, is, in my opinion, a fundamentally wrong governmental policy and can not be successfully defended.

COMPENSATION IN OTHER COUNTRIES.

In the following countries, by legislative enactment, the principle of compensation for loss incurred by governmental action in prohibiting or restricting business in like industries has received approval by government legislation: Great Britain, Switzerland, France, Norway, and Province of Quebec, Canada.

The official return of license statistics for Great Britain for 1913, published by the British Government in August, 1914, states that there was paid under the licensing act of 1904, providing for compensating the holders of extinguished beer and liquor licenses, amounts as follows:

During the nine years, 1905–1913, £8,873,137 was collected from the beer and liquor trade and paid over by the inland revenue to the compensation authorities, who paid out in compensation for 8,961 licenses a total of £8,073,127, and at the end of 1913 held balances aggregating £685,975, subject to claims in respect of 439 licenses refused, but not paid for down to the end of 1913. The difference of £114,035 odd (in addition to interest earned on sums lying in bankers' hands and any sums outstanding on loans less interest) presumably went in expenses.

In Switzerland the principle of compensation has been enforced for nearly five years. A law went into effect in 1910 forbidding the manufacture, sale, and importation of absinthe. This law was the outcome of a referendum submitted to a popular vote and adopted in 1908. The amendment carried a compensation clause, on the strength of which an indemnity law was passed by the Federal Council. The decree of the Federal Council of Switzerland provided that the money required to compensate all interested parties for losses sustained by them was to be obtained by raising the price of ardent spirits. The compensation to the owners of absinthe plants and to the manufacturers and holders of absinthe averaged four times the amounts of yearly profits in each case, labor excepted. Under this law labor has also been compensated in an equitable manner. An examination of the Swiss law's chief provisions will disclose that the Swiss Government compensated all interests materially concerned—farmer, manufacturer, landlord, and workingman.

I have no copies of the laws passed in France prohibiting the manufacture and the sale of absinthe, but according to telegraphic dispatches the French act provides that indemnities should be provided to manufacturers affected by the bill, and later dispatches disclose that the French policy will perhaps be to buy the stock of absinthe—which is the liquor prohibited—from the manufacturers and distil it into alcohol, and it was said the French Government would make a profit by this operation; and still later dispatches report that a measure was passed allowing approximately $2,600,000 as reimbursements for taxes paid by liquor dealers on absinthe in their possession and for the purchase of their stock of absinthe. It is thus fairly clear that the French compensation scheme embraces protection of all interests suffering financial loss by reason of prohibition of absinthe.

The alcohol commission appointed by the Norwegian Government to consider and report on the liquor question in all aspects handed in its report on May 6, 1915, favoring compensation.

The principle of compensation received legislative indorsement in the Province of Quebec, Canada. In the cities of Quebec and Montreal liquor-license holders whose licenses were annulled by statute are indemnified. The indemnities paid to eliminative license holders in the Province of Quebec is provided for by the imposition of a special license duty during 10 years upon the remaining hotel and restaurant liquor licenses. This special license is so framed that it is not only to repay the principal in 10 years but also interest at the rate of 4½ per cent upon the indemnities advanced to eliminative license holders by the provincial government. In other words, the remaining license holders are taxed to pay the cost of the indemnities paid to those ordered out of business. This recognition of the principle of compensation in Canada represents an entirely voluntary legislative action, because, while liquor licenses are recognized as vested interests in Canada, vested interests are not protected by organic constitutional provisions backed by court decisions, as they are in the United States, and no court in Canada has power to declare any parliamentary act unconstitutional.

When the Quebec Parliament decided ejected licensees were entitled to compensation it took this move wholly upon its judgment, voluntarily recognizing that the rights of license holders are as absolute as those of other property holders and should not be summarily destroyed without compensation.

The public sentiment for compensation for property or rights injured by governmental or private action has been asserting itself more vigorously in later years, as witness the legislation of 24 States that have passed workmen's compensation laws, as well as the Federal Congress. This field was long neglected, but now the principle of compensation has been put into effect. Economic writers all indorse the theory of compensation as being the only sound governmental policy. Our Federal courts have all held that the traffic in these industries was legitimate commerce and that the products of these industries are legitimate subjects of interstate commerce.

There is no question about the right of the Federal Government to provide in this amendment or otherwise a compensation for any loss occasioned by reason of the destruction of the business or the property involved in these industries.

The story of the wave of prohibition in Russia as a war measure has been given great publicity in this country, but I am informed—and I make the statement upon that information—that not in a single instance did the Russian Government deprive anybody of property. My information is that every vodka shop in Russia belonged to the Russian Government.

It was a Government institution; they simply ceased to manufacture or dispense vodka.

From the information I have been able to gather I am led to believe that every country that has attempted to restrict the sale, consumption, and distribution of intoxicating liquors has tendered compensation to those suffering loss therefrom.

EFFECTS OF PROHIBITION WITHOUT COMPENSATION.

Mr. President, any kind of prohibition legislation by this Congress, whether as a war measure, prohibiting grain in making distilled and fermented liquors, or by the submission of a constitutional amendment, will be acted on and accepted by the financial and business world and the public as the beginning of nation-wide prohibition, and all the financial and business disturbances that might follow the cessation of manufacture of alcoholic drinks as beverages under a war act by Congress would as swiftly and surely follow the passage of a resolution by Congress permitting a noncompensatory prohibition amendment. The financial and business and general public would make no distinction in either case. The public press and public sentiment have indorsed the compensation idea in connection with prohibition, as disclosed by the discussion and expressions of public opinion in the papers and otherwise concerning a recent action of the Senate of the United States with reference to distilled liquors. The compensation can be raised from a fund by an extra assessment or tax on the industry by congressional enactment.

I wish there were more Senators present to consider this suggestion.

I have no doubt it will be argued in support of this amendment without any compensation clause attached that its passage and submission to the State legislatures will leave the revenue intact from the industries for the Government for the remainder of the war, because it will take from two to five years to get the necessary 36 States to adopt the amendment, and that no shock to business or industry would occur during the war period.

An amendment submitted by Congress to the State legislatures without any time limit may be agitated and kept before the Sates forever, once Congress permits it. Once adopted by a State legislature no future legislature can set aside that adoption. If rejected by one legislature it can be continually brought up in succeeding ones. It took many years for the income-tax amendment to be ratified by three-fourths of the States. With this prohibition amendment without compensation hanging as a constant menace over the industry all know the stocks and securities and property would be utterly unsalable and of no commercial value in the financial world. On the passage of this amendment by Congress there would be an immediate rush to sell stocks, properties, and securities at any price. All loans secured by stocks, bonds, or warehouse certificates, or property would be called at once. The credit of all persons and corporations whose money was tied up in the industry would be at once ruined. The business world would act on the assumption that the industry was to be destroyed. The effect in financial and business circles would be substantially the same as though Congress should enact a law as a war measure prohibiting the use of grain in alcoholic beverages during the war. If the amendment is passed without a compensation clause, loss of credit and pressure to collect loans will immediately force small manufacturers and dealers to throw their property and product on the market and sacrifice the same for whatever is offered. This will force big manufacturers and dealers to do the same thing temporarily at least. Millions of dollars in property will be sacrificed and thousands of men will be bankrupted. You can not destroy arbitrarily without compensation $1,000,000,000 worth of property and throw 1,000,000 men out of employment at the same time without some form of serious financial disturbance.

Mr. President, this is not a matter of any particular interest to me. My attitude with respect to it is influenced solely by my conception of what is absolutely and fundamentally right.

If the two amendments to which I have referred—that offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], which has just been read, and the one that I have in mind to propose—should be agreed to, I am personally inclined to vote to submit the amendment to the States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Just a moment. I would vote for it if submitted in that form. At least, I would vote to submit an amendment in the form I have stated, if my vote should be necessary to pass the resolution by the requisite two-thirds majority, although in a broad way I am not in favor of national prohibition by a constitutional amendment. I have opposed that policy because I feel that it means an invasion of the rights of the States and a practical destruction of one of the few remaining constitutional ideas to which some of us still cling—the police power of the States; and yet in these latitudinarian times, I feel disposed, if a fair and just amendment can be agreed upon, to submit it to the States and let the States pass upon it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, did I understand the senior Senator from Missouri to say that he favored the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Which provides for compensated prohibition?

Mr. STONE. No. As I understand the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio, it merely provides that the amendment submitted shall be acted upon by the States within a given period.

Mr. SHERMAN. I had the impression that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio was upon the question of compensation, and that some one else offered the six-year amendment; but probably——

Mr. STONE. I said, if the Senator will permit me, that I had it in mind to offer an amendment to the joint resolution providing for compensation.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the Senator one pending, or does he intend to offer one?

Mr. STONE I said I had it in mind to offer one to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be very glad to see it when it is offered, Mr. President, because it is possible that the Senator from Missouri and myself may agree upon some such feature before we conclude our votes on this subject.

Mr. STONE. Possibly——

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am not opposed to some reasonable form of compensated prohibition. I am willing to vote for an amendment of that kind if it should be drawn in some reasonable form, but not to compensate for all property which may be rendered useless. A distillery that has the ability and the equipment for distilling alcohol can be transformed, and with the six-year limitation here it could be, possibly before the amendment should be adopted by three-fourths of the States, so adjusted that the property lost would be nothing, or comparatively small. Outside of the large distilleries which are used in the United States for distilling and preparing whisky as a beverage, there is a material part of that property which can be reequipped and readjusted in such a way as to prepare alcohol for industrial, chemical, and scientific purposes; and a large portion of that property will be saved.

I do not understand that this amendment will prevent the manufacture of alcohol. It only prevents the manufacture of intoxicating liquor used for beverage purposes. That is the language of the joint resolution of the Senator from Texas. That is its purpose. In some of the largest distilleries in the world, in Peoria, Ill., and Kentucky, used for manufacturing whisky as a beverage, outside of the property that is devoted exclusively and built exclusively for the manufacture of whisky there is a large part of that property which can be used for perfectly legitimate purposes. The part of a distillery, for instance, where whisky is made that is used for racking off the liquor will be wholly lost. Outside of that the greater part of the valuable property devoted to that purpose can be used for distilling alcohol.

It is impossible for the manufacture or distilling of alcohol to be stopped at this time. Every time, say, a $3.000 shell is made a barrel of alcohol is used, and a 500-pound bale of cotton is needed to prepare the explosive, that with the glycerine and the nitric acid that goes into it, with other compounds that chemically combine with the cotton, makes the high-power explosive.

High explosives require alcohol. No one believes that the manufacture of alcohol will cease. I have read some criticisms, and I have received some telegrams and letters that seem to contemplate that the senders and writers think that we will quit manufacturing alcohol, and so our preparedness program will wholly fail. That either comes from a design to mislead or from a lack of accurate information. Alcohol will continue to be made for many years—indefinitely—for industrial purposes. In that I include the manufacture of explosives. All the shells require explosives not only of the usual kind, but very high-power explosives under recent inventions developed in the European war. That will continue.

A very large part of the Peoria distilleries now making beverage whisky can be transformed for the manufacture of industrial alcohol. There is no occasion to have many millions of dollars' worth of property destroyed. There is no occasion either for millions of bushels of grain to go into whisky and other millions to go into malt liquors, or other foodstuffs, fruits, grapes, and the like, to go into forms of wine that are less injurious, it is true, than corn whisky or rye whisky. Nevertheless, they are food products, and there is no reason at this time to destroy the food value of these immense quantities of foodstuffs by turning them into intoxicating liquor.

Mr. President, I wish to be as brief as I can and keep within a reasonable adjourning time here. Some of what I wish to say I will say to-morrow under the 10-minute rule, but we are told that the brewing processes must continue, that beer is healthy. It may be healthy to some people, some kinds of beer, but not the kinds of beer we are making in this country. The beer that is brewed in this country is slop, Mr. President. It has destroyed more vital organs than human disease. It is largely brewed from corn and cheap rice. There are bubbles in it as large as a soap bubble. The bubbles that ornament the average schooner of domestic-brewed American beer look like the bubbles coming out of a pipe when a child blows bubbles for amusement. The small, fine bubble, not much larger than the head of a pin, that comes from the malt-brewed beer, is very scarce in this country. I repeat, Mr. President, that the brew of beer out of corn and rice and cheaper processes employed is literally a corrosive, rotting, burning slop. It has rotted more kidneys and perforated more stomachs, and destroyed more livers by cirrhosis and abscesses than all the natural diseases to which human flesh ever fell heir.

On billboards over the country we have seen the legend, "The beer that made Milwaukee famous." I saw away down in Yucatan at one time a parody on that. It said, "We brew the beer that made Milwaukee jealous." I went in and tried some of it. No white man can habitually drink it and live. It may be good for the men that dwell in the Tropics, because they are short lived, and some of them think it a blessing to die, anyhow—a relief from a sore vexation of the flesh.

But we use foodstuffs for beer, for stout, for ale, and for various other sorts of fermented or brewed liquor. Under this amendment we will discontinue that, and the brewery will lose some of its value. If it can not be used for a vinegar factory or for apple butter or for some legitimate purpose, I am willing to pay for it. There is a large part of the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Association's property which can be used for lawful purposes, and I do not believe a jury impaneled in a United States court would give any extraordinary damages. Their breeding barns and their stables and their fields, where they raised horses at one time, will not be lost. Their automobiles that have succeeded animal power for trucking purposes since then will not be lost. All those vehicles can be used, together with such animals as remain in their service, for legitimate purposes. Not one dollar would be a proper subject of award by way of damages in condemnation proceedings before a jury if you were condemning, under the right of eminent domain, this property to take it to use it for some other purpose. But when it is taken under the exercise of the police power of the State, when we take it because it has been devoted to a purpose that is declared to be no longer lawful, then all of the unlawful portion of the property that was used, if it can be converted into any other lawful pursuit, will not be lost, and will not properly be considered in an estimate of damages.

But the saloonkeeper comes in, and he is to be protected. Who offers that argument, and who writes the brief?

I wish to coincide with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. In presenting the brief on this question, Mr. President, I know who writes the brief for compensation for the saloon keeper. It is the brewery's lawyer. How are the breweries interested in the saloon keeper at the corner I pass on my way home, that seemed to have some kind of a vested right almost under the shadow of a schoolhouse in my town before they were voted out last April, all of them in a bunch? It is because, Mr. President, the brewery is the willful, guilty agent that breeds the saloon keeper all over the country. The brewery is the power that sets up convicts in the saloon business all over my State. No sooner are they freed from their sentences by lapse of time than the brewery picks them up and makes them fit subjects to be intrusted with a barroom and fixtures and a stock of beer and enough whisky to go along as a handmaid of the blessed beverage that gives health and strength—as they say in their advertisements. I never saw a man drink it in my life, steadily, that was not a good candidate for Bright's disease, or indigestion, or paralysis, if he kept it up long enough.

I began with many friends of liberal habits more than 30 years ago, Mr. President. Unfortunately some of them thought that brewers and distillers told the truth; their names have been cut on tombstones many a long year; some of them because they thought they could practice that belief. I have seen too many of them die in my time; I have seen some of them die with strange complaints, seeing strange things in the air and hearing strange voices; and in the delirium tremens that took them to their graves I have remembered that they were the victims of the saloon keeper, promoted by the brewery.

It is time now to tell the truth about these things. I have made up my mind the few remaining years of my life to tell the truth about it. I have voted "dry" ever since I have been a voter in local elections. I have passed far beyond the point where I believe that it is a question of local option.

Local option is well enough in its way, but to me you might just as well say that East St. Louis ought to have local option in murdering negroes and not be interfered with by anybody outside of the town. "It is a local matter. What business is it of yours or mine, living outside, if they do this?" It is just as much of a local matter, they might argue, as the saloon is a local matter.

There is not a State in the 48 States of the Union that has ever had a fair chance on the dry question, even when it voted dry. Maine is surrounded by land and water, with the possibilities of the habitual violation of her laws. Kansas, as stated by its senior Senator, has been territorially surrounded at all points of the compass until recently, and is yet bounded on the east by wet territory. Every dry State has had a similar experience. Every one of those States has lived with the ever-present possible inundation from the wet forces all around them, and nothing but the slender dikes of a State-created law to defend them against the lawless deeds of those whose principal purpose is to break the laws of the dry States.

I have heard all the time, Mr. President, that you could not enforce the liquor law, and what is the use of passing laws that you can not enforce? Who break them? The very men who offer the criticism; the very men who vote against all regulatory laws, State and National; the very men who object to any kind of regulation are the ones who come in afterwards and break the laws, and then offer their own offenses as the criticism for the laws that they despise and violate.

We have had a Sunday closing law since 1848 in Illinois, that no saloon in Illinois could open and sell on Sunday. Have saloons ever paid any attention to it? No. Immediately after the riot in Springfield, Ill., it was trailed to the contempt for and carelessness of the law in the town, as it was in East St. Louis born of lawlessness hatched in the saloons of a liberal administration. So we began to ask them to obey the Sunday closing law. They laughed at it. They continued to laugh at it. Juries were empaneled in Chicago and it was proved beyond question. They promptly acquitted them. The present mayor has enforced the law in the city of Chicago against saloons.

Outside of Chicago, in Cook County, the lid is off all the time. Sunday, daylight, midnight, and every other time saloons are open to everybody—men, women, children, drunkards, and everybody else who has the price.

I do not know what the result will be. The State attorney of Cook County announces that he intends to close the lid outside of the city limits of Chicago. I hope he will succeed.

I have been through that fight for more than 20 years. In 1909 I ran as a candidate for mayor for my home city, following the riot of 1908, a wide-open town. I was defeated by 137 votes, counted out in the very district or ward where the people were whom I wished to regulate. I accomplished the purpose. I had a hearing before the people of my home city. I had no more ambition to be mayor than township constable, except as it served the purpose. I told them what I knew about it and told the liquor interests in Springfield they must either clean up or clean out. It took eight years from that spring of 1909 to the spring of 1917 until they were cleaned out, because the brewers and saloon keepers would not reform. There were 215 saloons in a town of 70,000 population in business last spring before the election.

They got what they earned. Still, it is said it is a local question. It is no longer local, no more than the principles of sound government are local, no more than the principles of human life are local, no more than the principles of common decency are local, no more than the universally accepted principles of morality are local. It is a national question now and will remain a national question, and as the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] said, a nonpolitical question, unless it is forced to be made a political question, and then it will become one. Old party lines may, if the emergency require, disappear, but the reign of the saloon can not endure in this country.

It is true, as the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] said, it began as a local question. It is regarded now by many of the Senators from Southern States as a local question. I do not quarrel with their belief on that subject. I only say that when it is a local question and a State goes dry, and it is surrounded by partly or all wet territory you do not give the State a chance to be dry. You do not or can not enforce the laws and then offer that as a reason why all regulatory or prohibition laws should never be passed, simply because they are continually violated.

I am going to put in enough here to indicate what I mean on this subject and will then let it go at that. I intend to vote for this amendment or the resolution in any form in which it finally comes to a roll call, if it contains the essential principles of the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating beverages. I can do so without even arguing the question of the justice or injustice of it. I can vote for its submission on the ground that it is a subject of long continued agitation, one that has long been before States and people and has at last risen to the dignity of a proposed constitutional amendment; the 48 States of this Republic have a right now to pass upon that question.

Even if I were wet, if I were opposed to the amendment, there is no reason why any Senator should deny to the people of the States the right to pass upon a question and approve or reject this amendment. I put it upon that ground, if I could put it upon no other. Congress ought to vote to submit it to the people of the States.

In a sort of parenthetical way I asked here a few days ago or weeks ago is there anything more sacred than a human life? Still compensated emancipation for the slave was an open question at one time. Let me briefly recur to those things. In Lincoln's message read in this building on December 3, 1861, as it was laid that morning on the desk of Members, the present method of addressing Congress having been in disuse, and all the Members read the message on that day recommending that Congress provide for accepting such persons from such States according to some mode of valuation, "such persons" referring to such slaves as by their masters were made capable of being emancipated or freed.

In the privacy of his own room Mr. Lincoln wrote a compensated emancipation for the State of Delaware, a border State. George P. Fisher had been elected a Member of Congress on a sort of combination ticket, a free soiler in that State, as a Member of the House. Mr. Lincoln communicated through him with public sentiment in Delaware. They ascertained by a canvass of the members of the legislature it could not pass. The bill therefore was never introduced by the free soilers.

The proslavery men, however, in the Legislature of Delaware recited the whole bill in a preamble or joint resolution and condemned the bill at great length. A majority of the house members, of 21 members, passed the bill, repudiating compensated emancipation. In the senate there were nine members. One member was absent. Four members voted for it and four members voted against it, and it lost on the tie. Those records are found in the Senate journal of the State of Delaware at the special session of 1861 and 1862.

Again, President Lincoln, in a message of March 6, 1862, recommended the passage of a joint resolution for compensation. Roscoe Conkling introduced the resolution on the 10th of March, 1862, found in the Congressional Globe of that date. Conkling was then a Member of the House from the State of New York. It passed the House on the 11th day of March, 1862, by a vote of 89 to 31. It passed the Senate on the 2d day of April, 1862, by a vote of 32 to 10. It was approved by President Lincoln April 10, 1862.

Again, came an act abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia. It passed the Senate the 3d day of April, 1862, by 29 to 14, and the House on the 11th day of April, 1862, 92 to 38. It was approved by President Lincoln. It provided $100,000 as a preliminary to assist the voluntary immigration of slaves from the District of Columbia to Liberia and to compensate for such of them as were emancipated and remained in this country. President Lincoln wrote a letter to Henry J. Raymond, on the 9th day of March, 1862, and used the following remarkable language:

The cost of the war for half a day would pay for every slave in the State of Delaware. The cost for 87 days would pay for all the slaves in Maryland, Delaware, the District of Columbia, Kentucky, and Missouri.

Those were the whole network of border States, as the State of West Virginia had not yet been created by the war conditions that resulted in the birth of that State. It took all the border States and created what they call in Europe in politics a kind of a buffer State, a free-soil series of States created out of that slave territory by compensating slave owners for their property between the free States and the warring slave States.

In a message of the 14th of June, 1862, President Lincoln sent with it a copy of the bill recommending, according to the memorandum made in March, 1862, compensated emancipation. He wrote a letter to McDougall and another one to John J. Crittenden, of Kentucky, and in it he repeated what he had said to Raymond about the cost of the war. He showed in detail that there were 1,798 slaves held in the State of Delaware. Figuring them at $400 per head, it amounted to $719,200. He proposed to pay for those by issuing Government bonds to the owners, bearing 6 per cent interest. He showed, too, that the cost of one day of the war at that time was $2,000,000. He showed that the slaves in Delaware were 1,798; in Maryland, 87,188; in the District of Columbia, 3,181; in Kentucky, 225,490; and in Missouri, 114,965—a total of 432,622 slaves. At $400 a head, it amounted to $173,048,800, and 87 days of the war—$174,000,000—would more than pay for every one of the slaves in the border States. This was in the Crittenden letter worked out in detail. Every slave in the United States, estimating them at 4,000,000 at that time, at $400 a head, would have cost $1,600,000,000. John J. Crittenden used his influence all over Kentucky to beat the proposition and create sentiment against it. Lincoln sadly relinquished it and turned his attention to the sober duties of subjugating by military force the recalcitrant States

How much did it cost when the expense bill was paid? It was not $1,600,000,000. It was $8,000,000,000 of indebtedness before the Civil War debt was canceled, and it is not paid yet. Some of the bonds are still out, drawing, it is true, a reduced rate of indebtedness under refunding acts, but nevertheless a part of the war debt.

For me, rather than to disturb the economical conditions of the United States in legitimate investment with any property that has any proper claim to the care of this Government any property in a distillery that can not be used for any purpose, I would pay for it. The amount of it is exaggerated under the cold, hard daylight of experience, and before a jury sifting evidence of the value of the property that will be destroyed it will lower rapidly when the acid test of truth is applied to it. But if it should reach the amount stated by the Senator from Missouri of a thousand million dollars, I am willing, if it would insure the end of the traffic in intoxicating liquors, to vote for it now. If it would redeem and save some of my associates or their children or children's children from a future fate, if it will end it so far as this Republic can end it, I will pay for the rest of my life my proportional part of the billion-dollar tax that it may not be repeated.

If it will save but a single one, if it is of your family, if it is your neighbor's family, the billion dollars is a cheap price to pay. It is a good deal like Billy Sunday's revival. Some one asked me on a street car, "Do you favor Billy Sunday?" I said, "Yes." The man said, "I do not believe in such sensational things as that." "How many converts did he get in your town?" He said he got 1,500. "How long ago?" He said, "About 30 days ago." I asked if there were any backsliders. He said, "Oh, yes." "How many of them have backslidden?" He did not know. I said, "Suppose all but 5 or 10; what did it cost? How much did it cost you?" "Forty thousand dollars." "If the 5 or 10 belonged to my family," I replied, "and I had $40,000, Billy Sunday could have had it all. If he saved only one, and the one was a member of your family, you would think that Billy Sunday did not come to your town in vain."

I think the same way about the drunkard. If it only saved one, but it ends it and it ends it justly, I am not disposed to quarrel about the compensated prohibition, for if there is any sort of assurance that it can be put in a reasonable form, if a few who are now opposing this resolution will give their vote so that it will become an assured fact, I am willing to sit down and endeavor to frame something upon which we can agree. What I want is that the greatest Republic in the world shall take the forward step, and that this crime of the ages shall disappear through just amendment of its organic charter, even with compensation, if necessary. We have led the way in many things and we will never have a greater opportunity to rise to the sublime level of a great moral level and blaze the way for the future sons of men than we have now in the passage and submission to the States of such a resolution.

RECESS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, August 1, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 31, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee Infinite and Eternal Spirit for that influence ever going out from Thee, which holds the stars to their appointed courses, and is a potent influence in the affairs of men. Help us to comprehend as a people that we may be quick to perceive, wise in our judgments, and strong to execute Thy behests; that we may grow in influence and power and thus become willing instruments in Thy hands for the promotion of Thy kingdom in the earth, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. KEARNS, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. CROSSER, was given leave of absence indefinitely on account of death in his family.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1553. An act to give effect to the convention between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds concluded at Washington August 16, 1916, and for other purposes;

S. 2695. An act to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across Little River, Ark., at or near the foot of the gar hole about one-half mile south of the Jonesboro, Lake City & Eastern Railway bridge across Little River, Ark.; and

S. J. Res. 86. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point Aurelio Collazo, a citizen of Cuba.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 3331. An act for the protection of desert-land entrymen who enter the military or naval service of the United States in time of war.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 4285, the river and harbor bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the river and harbor bill, disagree to all the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. I object

UNANIMOUS CONSENT TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the liberty bonds.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. I will withhold it.

Mr. KING. I want to say that when the gentleman knows the subject perhaps he will withdraw his objection. It is on a subject with which I have no doubt the gentleman is entirely familiar, and that is the diatomicity of elementary bodies, which is not volatile but hypothetical.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk began reading the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman stated that he offered a report from the Committee on Rules, and the Clerk is proceeding to read a resolution that is now on the calendar and not in the possession of the Committee on Rules at all.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Rules has charge of the resolution.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman from North Carolina is proposing to report a resolution not in possession of the committee but in possession of the House.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I call up House resolution 126.

Mr. MANN. I shall not make a point of order that it is not privileged, although I think that probably it is not.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House resolution 126.

Resolved, That the bill H. R. 4285, entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," be, and hereby is, taken from the Speaker's table, with the Senate amendments thereto, to the end that the said amendments be, and hereby are, disagreed to; and a conference be, and hereby is, asked with the Senate on the disagreeing votes on said amendments, and the Speaker shall immediately appoint the conferees.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. If the gentleman from North Carolina can prove that it is a privileged resolution, I shall have nothing to say.

Mr. POU. The burden of proof is on the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois wish to be heard?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not; I will submit it to the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the resolution be 20 minutes on a side, 20 minutes to be controlled by myself and 20 minutes by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], and at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. MADDEN. I object to any unanimous-consent agreements.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina demands the previous question.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MADDEN. I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point that no quorum is present, and evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 198, nays 93, answered "present" 4, not voting 136, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.
A quorum being present, the doors were opened.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] is entitled to 20 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] to 20 minutes.
Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House is whether or not the river and harbor appropriation bill shall be sent to conference. The bill passed the House by an overwhelming majority. It passed the Senate by an overwhelming majority. It is hard to understand why any gentleman should object to the bill taking its usual legislative course and going to conference. That is the apology for this rule, if any apology is necessary. It is hard to understand, also, why gentlemen should object to the passage of this bill at this time. The Government is spending millions of dollars improving our merchant marine and millions of dollars are being expended in the preparation of our railroads for carrying the immense commerce of this country. Every effort is being made by the Government to improve our transportation facilities. We are talking in billions, not in millions, but when it is proposed to appropriate a few million dollars for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country, certain gentlemen say, "No; this must not be done." It is hard to understand the mental attitude of gentlemen who put themselves in opposition to this legislation.
I reserve the remainder of my time.
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, there was an understanding that there should be no legislation at this session of Congress except legislation directly bearing upon the war. This is a violation of that understanding. I doubt if there are Members of this House who have not told their constituents that it was impossible to get consideration of matters in which they were interested, because Congress had decided to consider nothing at this session except matters pertaining to the war.
Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes.
Mr. DUPRÉ. Does not the gentleman differentiate between legislation such as he has in mind and this, which is a bill designed to remedy a situation where a supply bill failed last year?
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. No; many bills failed last year.
Mr. DUPRÉ. Not supply bills.
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Many bills failed here last year that have not been brought up at this special session of Congress. This bill might have been made in order if it had been confined to the improvement of our harbors and had left out the matter of paving some of our rivers and smaller streams, matters that can not in any way have any bearing upon the conduct of the war. If this bill had come out of the Committee on Roads and had included some of the money that is to be expended on the rivers for improving roadways, it might have been of some use as a war measure. We shall use our harbors and we shall use our roadways, but there will be no use of the rivers as a war measure within the next legislative year.
Mr. DUPRÉ. Not the rivers of Kansas.
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The rivers of Kansas carry as much commerce as most of the rivers provided for in this bill.
Mr. CARLIN. I thought Kansas had gone dry.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. If we vote $750,000,000 to build ships on the rivers and in harbors of the United States, does not the gentleman think it a fair war proposition to spend $26,000,000 improving the rivers and harbors?
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We are spending these millions of dollars to go upon the high seas, not upon the rivers.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Do we build ships upon the high seas or build them in the rivers and harbors?
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. We build them in our harbors, and I stated we could improve our harbors.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. They go to the high seas through the rivers and the harbors.
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It depends on where they are built; if they are built on Cow Creek——
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Of course if they are built on Cow Creek, they do not get to the ocean; it does not flow that far.
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If we spent as much money on Cow Creek as they propose to spend on other streams, we could make it as navigable as the other streams to the sea.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman object to spending 26 cents per capita to improve the rivers and harbors upon which to build and carry commerce, if he votes for $7.50 per capita to build ships for the seas?
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am opposed to throwing one cent per capita away on useless expenditures. The money can be wisely expended in improving our harbors.
Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman voted for the $640,000,000 aviation bill, did he not?
Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?
The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman yield?
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.
Mr. FREAR. May I ask the gentleman from Kansas if he objects to spending $20,000,000 for a 13-mile canal up here and about the same amount of money on the Cape Cod Canal that can not at least at this time be considered a war measure?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I am, and for that reason I am opposed to this bill at this session of Congress. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time, and yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, this is the most extraordinary legislative situation I have ever seen. A great many items have been placed in this bill by the Senate that under the rules of the House should have been considered in the Committee of the Whole; but, no, you Democrats, who insist upon spending money for "pork," do not want Members to have a chance to consider them, so you adopt the extraordinary course of bringing in a special rule and of moving the previous question and gagging Members of the House so as to deprive them of an opportunity to tell the facts in the case. We are in a great war, and we need every dollar the people of the country can raise to fight that war. [Applause.] And next year the people will tell you men who are wasting this money how they feel about it, and you will be apologizing for your lack of interest in the people and for the unjustifiable expenditure of this vast sum of money.

When the people begin to pay the taxes next year you will hear from them. They have paid no taxes connected with the conduct of this war yet, but we are going ahead and spending their money with no thought of how it affects their welfare. Taxes must be levied to meet your extravagant expenditures, and the people will be compelled to pay them, and they will want to know what this money was expended for, and when they are told that it was expended for moving hyacinths from some of the sluggish creeks where there is no navigation they will give you some evidence of how they feel toward you. Aside from that, I do not understand why the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors [Mr. SMALL] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] come into the House and urge the appropriation of so vast a sum of money—$27,000,000—for no real purpose whatever, and as the president and the vice president of the Inland Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association Magazine criticize Members of the House in the columns of that magazine because they do not agree with them. Mr. MOORE writes an editorial on the front page of this magazine, in which he sets forth the money that is to be expended for other purposes and wonders why we object to the expenditure of money that has nothing whatever to do with the conduct of the war, and then they have the effrontery to print an editorial in that magazine which reads as follows:

> The river and harbor bill as reported to the House contained many items of vital importance to national preparedness along the Atlantic seaboard, and for this reason should have commanded the support of every Member from every seaboard State. We regret to note the following names of eastern Congressmen who voted against the bill. While there may have been other reasons sufficient in their opinion to justify opposition to the interests of their own States, we prefer to believe that their course was due to misleading statements emanating from the opposition, to which, through lack of personal information, they gave a measure of belief unwarranted by the facts.

Then they give the names of the men by States, as follows:

MAINE.

Hersey (Rep.), Houlton; White (Rep.), Lewiston.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

Wason (Rep), Nashua; Burroughs (Rep.).

MASSACHUSETTS.

Carter (Rep.), Needham Heights; Dallinger (Rep.), Cambridge; Gillett (Rep.), Springfield; Rogers (Rep.), Lowell; Tinkham (Rep.), Boston; Treadway (Rep.), Stockbridge; Walsh (Rep.), New Bedford; Phelan (Dem.), Lynn; Tague (Dem.), Boston; Gallivan (Dem.), Boston; Fuller (Ind.), Malden.

RHODE ISLAND.

Stiness (Rep.), Warwick.

CONNECTICUT.

Tilson (Rep.), New Haven.

NEW YORK.

Fairchild, G. W. (Rep.), Oneonta; Magee (Rep.), Syracuse; Platt (Rep.), Poughkeepsie; Sanders (Rep.), Stafford; Sanford (Rep.), Albany.

NEW JERSEY.

Parker (Rep.), Newark; Ramsey (Rep.), Hackensack; Scully (Dem.), South Amboy.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Focht (Rep.), Lewisburg; Dewalt (Dem.), Allentown; Kelly (Ind.), Braddock.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Byrnes (Dem.), Aiken; Nicholls (Dem.), Spartanburg.

GEORGIA.

Bell (Dem.), Gainesville; Crisp (Dem.), Americus.

I submit that no Member of the House has the right to own and publish a magazine to advocate measures in which he is interested and to criticize Members of the House for exercising their rights as Members of the House during the consideration of these measures.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I thought the gentleman was opposed to press censorship.

Mr. MADDEN. I am opposed to any Member of this House having the effrontery to come here as the president or vice president of a magazine that is advocating measures in which he is interested and criticizing other Members of the House for the exercise of their privileges as Members of the House during the consideration of these measures. I think it is not only indelicate; it is indecent. It is unwarranted; it is unjustifiable, and I think they ought to be compelled to apologize to the House. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I decline to yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want to know——

Mr. MADDEN. I decline to yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FITZGERALD). The gentleman declines to yield. The gentleman will be in order.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, it seems to me that if legislation brought before this House has any merit, it ought to be considered on its merit, and I for one Member of the House propose to exercise my rights as a Member of the House and to accord to every other Member of the House the same rights, even the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], to criticize on the floor of the House what I say or do on the floor of the House; but I resent and I shall continue to resent the ownership by Members of the House of magazines publishing any criticism of Members of the House who oppose legislation advocated by them. This is wrong. It ought not to be permitted. Public attention ought to be called to it, and to the extent of my ability I propose to call the attention of the public to it. [Applause.]

These gentlemen are very touchy when you criticize what they do, but they not only feel free to criticize others in their capacity as Members of the House on the floor of the House, but they go beyond all reason and all decency in the publication of a magazine to promote legislation in which they are interested.

A MEMBER. With a yellow cover.

Mr. MADDEN. With a yellow cover. [Laughter.] A yellow cover and a yellow streak, and say things in the magazine that they would not dare say on the floor. And I propose, as far as I can, to make these gentlemen explain their connection with this yellow sheet to the Members of the House on the floor of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman can speak in his own time. I decline to yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will be in order. He can not interrupt the gentleman who has the floor.

Mr. MADDEN. Now, under the rules of the House this bill should have gone to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I realize the difficulty under which my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] labors. He has had a mountain upon his shoulders since the river and harbor bill was first introduced, and he has had difficulty in carrying it. It is a big load for any man to undertake to manage the affairs of the country as he has done with respect to rivers and harbors, and I sympathize with him.

He is a potential Member of this House, and when he rises in his place to condemn a fellow Member for some alleged impropriety, of course it follows that such a Member should feel himself squelched and prepare to resign his seat. Several times, when the gentleman from Illinois was reflecting upon me I endeavored to correct him by an observation or two, but I could not seem to get his attention or that of the Chair. The Chair seemed to have difficulty in hearing me even when the gentleman from Illinois called upon me to apologize to the House and I arose to respond to him.

Of course, I had no intent, I will say to the Chair and to the House, of apologizing to the gentleman from Illinois. I never apologize to a man who is in error and who makes ridiculous charges. I never apologize for anything I write or say with respect to the assinine statements of a Member of the House or anybody else, whether they appear in a magazine or in the proceedings of the House. Nor do I consider any Member free from just criticism.

But I will say this, Mr. Speaker, no man who is a Member of this august body has made himself more supremely ridiculous in recent months than has the gentleman from Illinois in criticizing certain features of the river and harbor bill. [Applause.] He knew absolutely nothing about some of the projects he criticized. He had just one long, continuous grouch, from which he could not seemingly recover, and when the bill was finally passed, against his solemn but mighty protest, he still struggled to defeat the measure, though it was proven the House and the people wanted it.

The gentleman from Illinois is safe away out yonder in the district that he represents against an attack upon either one of our great seaboards. If the Japanese should strike the Pacific coast it would be some time before they got overland to the gentleman's district. If the Germans should attack us upon the Atlantic coast it would also be a long while before they could reach the gentleman's home in Chicago, and by the time they did reach it the gentleman would have ample notice to escape to the mountains and avoid the impact. The gentleman is courageous, from his mid-country standpoint. The guns of the enemy thundering along the seaboard would not reach him until he had time to cover his retreat. He is perfectly safe in attacking worthy projects along the Atlantic seaboard and along the Pacific coast and the Gulf. It matters not to him that the guns of the enemy may penetrate the coastal cities or that the ships of the enemy may invade our ports. He pleads for economy when it comes to that.

The gentleman from Illinois has discussed the matter of canals and has heaped ridicule upon them, as has the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]—the gentleman who rose to interrupt him, seeing that no such proceeding as this should be enacted without a word or two from him. [Laughter.] But the gentleman did not know that the very project he was criticizing—the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal—stands to the United States relatively the same as does the Kiel Canal to the great German Empire. The gentleman from Illinois can not understand that. The gentleman is too remote from the coast line. He knows little about shipping or the danger to shipping in the United States, and feeling perfectly safe, does not care to learn. The gentleman does ridiculous things in this relation. He cheerfully votes $7.50 per capita to build ships but refuses to vote 26 cents per capita to get the ships out of our rivers and harbors to meet the enemy on the high seas. [Applause.]

The gentleman stood here during the early days of the war insisting that we should vote everything in the United States to continue and complete the war. He now complains about the smallest of the expenditures to prosecute the war. The gentleman was quite bold and brave when giving away the money of the people of the United States to prosecute a war that may or may not have been ours. The gentleman is equally brave now in refusing to permit the expenditure of money to put our rivers and harbors in order to meet a resourceful and a daring foe. In this essential he would leave us unprepared.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman talks about wasting money. If he does that on this bill, thinking to make political capital for the Republican Party at the expense of the Democratic Party, which happens to be in power, I challenge him. If that is the gentleman's game, being as good and stalwart a Republican as he is, I say he makes a mistake. A vote for this bill at this time is a patriotic vote and for the welfare of the whole country. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] use some of his time?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, with the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], who just preceded me, we inflict ourselves regularly upon your attention when this bill is before the House. He did it for many years before I came here, and he will do it constantly in the future. The yellow book, of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] speaks, bears the signature of Mr. MOORE upon the title-page. He is the editor. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], the distinguished chairman of the committee, appears here as vice president of the same organization.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. No; I did not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. He is making a misstatement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I call him down.

Mr. FREAR. I do not yield, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I ask that the gentleman's words be taken down. The gentleman is making a misstatement, and I will not stand for it. If the Chair is going to be arbitrary, I will insist on my rights. I demand that the gentleman's words be taken down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will suspend, and the Clerk will report the words.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask that this be not taken from my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will see that the gentleman's time is protected. The Clerk will report the words.

The Clerk read as follows:

The yellow book, of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] speaks, bears the signature of Mr. MOORE upon the title-page. He is the editor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is enough. That statement is not true.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the words which have been read do not violate the rule. The gentleman from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I trust I will not be interrupted again by the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I move to have those words stricken from the RECORD, because they are not true.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's motion is not in order. The gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry. I asked that the gentleman's words be taken down——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair had the words taken down, and when they had been read the Chair ruled that they were not disorderly or in violation of the rule. The gentleman from Wisconsin will proceed in order.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But they contain a misstatement of facts affecting a Member of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in order. He can not discuss the facts. The words of the gentleman from Wisconsin were not in violation of the rule. The gentleman from Wisconsin will proceed, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania will take his seat.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania knew he was not in order. His name appears upon the title page of this magazine in which he makes this criticism of House Members——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I am not the editor of that magazine. That is a misstatement of fact.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will take his seat, or the Sergeant at Arms will compel him to do so.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I bow to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. FREAR. Upon page 4 of this magazine is a criticism on Members of the House for voting against this bill, challenging their right to do so. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, who time and again has insisted that the words be taken down, is hoping to frighten the people who are opposing this bill by such statements and constant interruptions now, but he can not do it, and he has discovered that; nor can he bluff the gentleman who is occupying the Speaker's chair.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this pamphlet is not a regular publication; it is a lobby publication, that is all, representing those who are interested in the inland-waterway project and in the passage of river and harbor bills generally.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FREAR. No; I can not yield. I have not time, and I want to discuss the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin declines to yield.

Mr. FREAR. On page 51 of the bill is the only praiseworthy amendment placed in the bill by the Senate, I submit to the House. We should agree to that amendment. I only wish there were 200 other amendments in the bill of the same import. Please listen while I read this amendment, which is found on page 51:

SEC. 15. That Mosquito Creek, in Colleton County, S. C., be, and the same is hereby, declared to be a nonnavigable stream within the meaning of the Constitution and the laws of the United States.

Gentlemen, one-half of the projects contained in this bill could well afford to be listed in the same column with this Mosquito Creek, because not used for actual waterway commerce. I have given official statistics repeatedly to show that our rivers and creeks are deserted.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. FREAR. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman from Wisconsin charges the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] with being the editor of this magazine. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania state on the title page there that he is the editor?

Mr. FREAR. Oh, I do not know the technical position held. His name is on the title page under a signed article.

Mr. MADDEN. What does the article say, to which the gentleman from Wisconsin refers?.

Mr. FREAR. The article discusses the river and harbor bill, this very bill that is under consideration here.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I can state the facts about that——

Mr. FREAR. Under the gentleman's signature is the word "president." I can not yield to the gentleman. He takes too much of my time. I would be delighted to yield or to converse with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but the gentleman, who so frequently challenges the rights of others, has no right to interrupt at this time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I can tell the gentleman——

Mr. FREAR. But you can not, for I decline to yield. Mr. Speaker, this bill is objectionable, because it contains the worst grouping system that has ever existed in any bill that has come before the Congress of the United States with reference to rivers and harbors. It is impossible hereafter to strike out unwarranted and indefensible items, because they are grouped with others, in many instances, with from a dozen to 20 or more items in a group. This bill contains about 400 projects, more than can be found in any other bill within my experience during three different sessions of Congress. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] constantly interrupted the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] awhile ago and wanted to know about the 27 cents average charge to every man, woman, and child by the $27,000,000 contained in the bill. It is not the amount alone but it is the character of the items that we challenge. When he talks about the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks, that is to protect the people of Illinois from a foreign enemy, let me say, I passed through that canal on the invitation of my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania, and my judgment was not changed by the trip.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has a good project in the Delaware River. I concede that. It receives over a million and a half dollars in this bill. The other project of $20,000,000 ultimately for 13 miles of a bankrupt canal that can not be constructed for years to come, with which to defend the gentleman from Illinois from the Germans, is another proposition. That canal can not be defended at this time. What is true of that proposition is also true of the Cape Cod Canal Senate amendment in this bill. Twenty million dollars more for another canal that can not be used at this time. These are items in this remarkable preparedness measure. Less than half a dozen harbor projects have been proposed as preparedness items by naval officers. Is the upper Mississippi a preparedness item? Is the Ohio a preparedness item, and all these other 400 creek and canal projects contained in the bill, are they preparedness projects?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. FREAR. I concede that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who occupies the time of the House on nearly every conceivable subject, has the right to object.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin one minute more.

Mr. FREAR. In brief, let me say this bill covers $27,000,000. With the Senate amendments it is practically the 1917 bill that was defeated in the Senate last session. In some respects it is worse than the last bill. Some of the ablest men in the United States Senate have fought this bill, but it covers practically every district and State with some local item. Of course it is going through, but sooner or later we are going to get to the end. Remember that there were 132 votes with 20 pairs against the bill, and 152 votes is progress. The people are getting tired of these extravagant, indefensible omnibus bills. The only honest way to take up these items is as a Government business proposition, and I am just as desirous as anyone that the good projects in the bill should be cared for. Some projects in this bill are good. Others, the large majority, are in the bill simply because it is an omnibus bill, and all these 400 items carry votes that help to put through the pork barrel.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ].

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], with an air of injured innocence and a tone of righteous indignation, says that the adoption of the previous question on the rule has had the effect of gagging the House. I want to ask who gagged the House. The House did it itself by a majority of 105, and one of the reasons why it was done is because the House is tired of the dilatory tactics and the frivolous arguments of Members opposed to this bill, tired of the course which they have been pursuing ever since it first came under consideration, and so, by ordering the previous question, the House showed its resentment just now by putting a stop to that sort of thing. One man gagged the House yesterday, and again to-day, and that man was the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], who refused unanimous consent, contrary to the wish of a large majority of the House, that the bill go to conference without further parley. So much for that.

The bill passed the House last June by a majority of 72 votes, a larger majority than the river and harbor bill has received since the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] first came into the House and began to fight river and harbor bills. I hope he will keep on, because I think future majorities for these bills will continue to grow in proportion to and commensurately with the ardor of the fight he makes against legislation of this character. [Applause.]

This bill passed the Senate last Thursday. By the way, the river and harbor bill in the last session of Congress never was defeated in the Senate. It failed of consideration because of conditions which we all know. This bill, as I say, passed the Senate a few days ago by a vote of 50 to 11, showing a great majority in that body, as well as in this, in favor of caring for our rivers and harbors, even at this time. It seems to me that in the light of the pronouncedly favorable expression of the two Houses, this bill should be sent to conference without delay, and then Members who want to flaunt their ignorance and who want to indulge in chestnuts and persiflage will have another chance when the conference report comes back to renew that kind of talk. Or if they have any legitimate criticism to make on the conference report, opportunity will then be afforded them. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, we have but one more speech on this side.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think we have used all the time on our side.

Mr. POU. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was before the House for consideration the opponents of the bill contended, first, that it was an improper bill to consider during the existence of the war, and, second, that there were items in the bill which were not meritorious and which made it a bad bill, or, as some gentlemen rolled under their tongues, a "pork-barrel" bill.

Proponents of this bill contended that transportation was one of the essentials for the successful prosecution of this war; that as we were spending millions of dollars to increase production of the necessaries, as well as munitions and war supplies, the transportation and the distribution of these products were equally as necessary. Admittedly the railroads of the country, we pointed out, were not equal to the transportation demands of the present time. There was only one other instrumentality of transportation to which we could turn, and that was the waterways of the country. Did the critics of the bill meet that argument? Did they in any wise attempt to minimize the importance of transportation and the great importance at this time of maintaining, preserving, and improving our waterways and increasing our water carriers?

Not at all. On the contrary, they made a miserable, tragic failure before the House and the country. They indulged in facetious remarks, erroneous statements, and fallacious arguments. The attitude of the critics of this bill was puerile and unworthy of intelligent men.

What about their contention that this bill was unmeritorious? I and others had the privilege of challenging the Members of the House upon either side to point out a single project in this bill which was not meritorious. Neither the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] nor the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], nor did any other gentleman during that entire debate, point out a single unworthy item in the bill.

And yet, in the face of their egregious failure, they have to-day pursued the unmanly and unjustifiable course of denouncing this bill without producing one semblance of fact or argument to justify their attitude.

After all these challenges and our charges upon their mental integrity, these gentlemen have again made spectacles of themselves by indulging in generalities and superlative adjectives.

Are they trying to play politics with the river and harbor bill? I assume to tell these gentlemen that they can not make their campaign for the Senate or any other office by opposition to the improvement of our rivers and harbors. They disparage the intelligence and patriotism of their constituencies. I have more faith in their wisdom and their loyalty to the country.

I think it is necessary, as there will be no more discussion upon this rule, that I should refer to a statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. He stated that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] was the editor of this magazine, which he flaunted here, and he did not have the manliness to give Mr. MOORE an opportunity to reply. I refer to the monthly bulletin of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I decline to yield. He did not give the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] an opportunity to deny it. I deny the statement. He is not the editor. A gentleman named Wilfred H. Schoff is the editor, and I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if that is not correct?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is true, and I have made that statement to the gentleman from Wisconsin several times; he knows it full well.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman from Wisconsin referred to the Chesapeake and Delaware waterway and said it would cost $20,000,000, and the gentleman nods his head in assent and still maintains it. He is incorrect——

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FREAR. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can not interrupt to make a parliamentary inquiry. He must take his seat.

Mr. SMALL. I decline to yield, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. FREAR. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin can not take the gentleman from North Carolina off the floor in that way. The gentleman is not in order. He must not interrupt the gentleman without his consent.

Mr. FREAR. Can the gentleman tell me to take my seat?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair directs the gentleman to take his seat.

Mr. FREAR. I shall comply with that, but the gentleman told me to take my seat.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman must not discuss it.

Mr. SMALL. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has two minutes and a half remaining.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, what are the facts? The project of the Chesapeake & Delaware waterway, as recommended by the engineers, involves a total cost of $8,000,000, including the cost of the present canal. That is the truth. Why did not the gentleman from Wisconsin tell the truth?

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. I decline to be interrupted, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield, and the gentleman must not interrupt him without his consent.

Mr. SMALL. I am telling the House that the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin is not true, and if he was informed he would know it was not true.

If the gentleman from Wisconsin can come in here at any time in the future and bring any evidence to prove that I am wrong in my statement, I shall concede it; but he can not do it. The gentleman has made misstatements all through this bill. I read an interview in the Philadelphia Record of yesterday morning, which some friend kindly sent to me, that is full of errors and misstatements which are due either to the gentleman's ignorance or his willful desire to avoid the truth.

So, Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of opposition we have had to this bill. What has been the result? In this House the bill passed by nearly a hundred majority. This morning we ordered the previous question by more than a hundred majority. The opposition in the other body, about which we heard so much, subsided and collapsed, and only 11 of the Members of the other body had the temerity to cast their votes in opposition to the bill. I desire to say this in conclusion: This is a meritorious bill. In all the discussion no critic has been able to point out a single item in it which is not meritorious. You were challenged to do it, and you failed; and now again we are met with a statement of generalities about a pork barrel, and about this being an improper bill during the period of the war, and of statements similar to those made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] about paving rivers. Why not tell the truth? Why not meet this bill candidly and openly and courageously and discuss it like we do other bills? You must respect this bill because it is one of the great supply bills of the Nation, and it ought to be cared for annually, just as any other appropriation bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. All time has expired. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays. As many as are in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-nine—not a sufficient number.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman demands the other side. Those who are opposed to taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-six. A sufficient number has risen to order the yeas and nays, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 188, nays 103, answered "present" 4, not voting 136, as follows:

James	Nelson	Sherman

Mr. PAGE. I will state that my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is necessarily absent from the Senate. He is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. HUGHES], owing to illness.

Mr. KING. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is detained on official business.

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-eight Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the amendment of the Constitution of the United States is a matter that should be given the most careful consideration. The makers of this instrument, in providing how it should be changed, sought to place around it every possible safeguard.

When the Constitution was framed we had but 13 States, and the approval of 9 was required to change it. To-day we have 48 States, and the consent of 36 of them is needed.

The men who framed the Constitution had no conception that a number of States representing a minority of the people of the country might at some time determine whether the fundamental law of the land should be changed. Yet that condition exists to-day.

As the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] indicated in his remarks last Monday, there are 12 States in this country whose total population exceeds by 9,000,000 that of the other 36; it is also true that there are 18 States in the Union—namely, Nevada, Wyoming, Idaho, Arizona, Montana, New Mexico, Utah, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, North Dakota, South Dakota, Oregon, Delaware, Maine, Florida, Colorado, and Connecticut—with a total population less than that of New York, yet with eighteen times its influence in the final determination of this question.

Congress recently enacted a law, known as the Webb-Kenyon Act, which prevents the shipment of liquor of any description into so-called "dry" territory. I voted for this measure, and also voted to override the President's veto of it, because I believed that every State should be protected in the enforcement of its laws affecting its own people. During the last session Congress also enacted the so-called Reed amendment forbidding the distribution in "dry" States of publications containing liquor advertisements.

These two measures make certain that where the people of any community desire to have prohibition it can be obtained and successfully enforced.

In my own State, at the recent session of the legislature, a bill was passed providing for local option on this question. The people of any section of New York State therefore can at any time provide that no liquor shall be sold in their respective communities; and it is possible at any time for the legislature of the State of New York to submit to the people of that State an amendment to its constitution, State wide in its effect, prohibiting the manufacture and sale of liquor. This can be done without reference to national legislation, and, Mr. President, it is a simple thing for the people of New York and, for that matter, of every State in the Union, to have just such legislation whenever they wish it.

The food-control bill now in conference, which will in all probability be enacted into law within a few days, carries a provision prohibiting the manufacture and sale of whisky during the period of the war. This, in my judgment, marks the end of the whisky business in the United States. I voted for this provision in the food measure and shall be glad to vote for a substitute for the pending amendment prohibiting the manufacture and sale of whisky but permitting beer and light wines.

Whisky is the curse that we must be rid of. Whisky is the wrecker of homes, the demoralizer of men's minds, and I shall vote whenever the opportunity offers to prevent its manufacture and sale.

Mr. President, I am convinced that no representative of the State of New York in either House of Congress should lightly vote for an amendment to the Constitution, for, once the measure has passed here and been referred to the several States for ratification, the influence of New York in the final determination of the subject is no greater than that of the smallest State in the Union.

During my service in this body I shall hesitate before voting for any amendment to the Constitution unless I feel certain that there is an overwhelming demand for it on the part of the people of my State.

This amendment is of far-reaching importance. It affects the habits and the customs of the people. Forty per cent, or over 2,400,000, of those residing in the city of New York are of foreign birth; 78 per cent are of foreign birth or of foreign or mixed parentage. Only 22 per cent of the total of six million odd people of that city were born here of native parents. That same proportion will hold good in nearly every large city in the country.

These people have fixed customs. It is the habit of the great bulk of them, occasionally and moderately, to partake of beer and light wines.

Now, while we are engaged in a great war, to take that from them would, I very much fear, bring serious dissatisfaction and distrust of the good intentions of the Government. A great proportion of our people regard it as a necessity, a part of their everyday life.

Mr. President, we are working out many problems in these days to which all of us must give our very best thought. I am thinking of the contentment of our people. Its importance can not be overestimated. We are organizing and working the great industries and resources of this country so as to produce the greatest and best results. To do that it is all imperative that we have the whole-hearted and enthusiastic help and cooperation of every individual. Will it help, or will it harm, to say to the average man that he shall not have something to which he has long been accustomed, and causes no appreciable if any detriment to his physical well-being? Shall we deny to him something which he honestly believes to be a necessity? Is this going to produce more of all the things we need to prosecute vigorously the pending war? Or will it lessen the interest of our workingman in the product of his toil and his contentment, confidence, and trust in his Government?

I shall vote against the pending amendment. The reasons I have just stated and the ease with which the respective States can pass upon it for their own people, as an evidence of which fact I believe 24 States have already done so, brings me to the conclusion that in justice to the 11,000,000 people I have the honor to represent here I can take no other course than to vote against the amendment as presented by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I have been tied up for the last two months with my duties as a member of the Finance Committee in the consideration of the revenue bill, and I have had little opportunity to participate in the deliberations on the floor of the Senate. I desire, however, during a brief adjournment of the committee to say a few words on the pending resolution.

I shall vote against the resolution, Mr. President, regardless of the merits or demerits of the proposition contained therein. In my opinion the resolution constitutes a radical, revolutionary departure from the fundamental principles of the American Government.

Serious doubt may be expressed whether any amendment to the Constitution may properly be placed in that instrument which, without the consent of all the States, would deprive any one of them of one or more of the several reserved powers. It was agreed on all sides when the Constitution was adopted that it required unanimous consent of the States, since the States were surrendering powers to the Federal Government, and it will be recalled that until North Carolina finally agreed to the Constitution that State was considered not a part of the Union, and Congress passed a tariff act in 1789 under which goods coming into the Union from North Carolina were subject to duty; and Congress passed an act exempting North Carolina from the tariff law so soon as North Carolina consented to the Constitution.

If it required the unanimous consent of the States in 1789 to secure the agreement of each to the surrender of its powers delegated to the Federal Government, how can rights of States, such as Pennsylvania, New York, and North Carolina, not unanimously delegated in 1789, and still reserved in the States, be taken from them by mere amendment of the Constitution?

The police power is the most vital of all the reserved powers in the States, but under this proposed amendment certain States in the Union which did not, in 1789, and in all likelihood now, could never be made to surrender the police power to the Federal Government, will find a large part of that power wrenched from them, not only without their consent but in defiance of their wishes. Concede that the only presently important limitation on amendment in Article V of the Constitution provides that no State shall be deprived of its equal representation in the Senate without its consent, this specified limitation on the power of amendment in no way concludes the proposition that States can be deprived of their reserved powers without their consent. On the contrary, it suggests that the framers of the Constitution conceived no amendments as being possible or pertinent except those within the field covered by the original instrument itself, such as those relating to the structure of the Federal Government itself, the treatment of citizens of the United States by the State governments, the relation of the Federal Government to the sovereign States of the Union, and the coordination of the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Federal Government. An amendment relating to the representation of the States in the Senate would have fallen within this field, and the States safeguarded this possibility by putting it beyond the reach of amendment.

No historian or student of this Government will agree that, had the thirteen original States conceived that immediately upon the adoption of the Constitution their reserved powers could have been amended out of their possession, the thirteen States would have unanimously assented to the Constitution and made it their contract and charter of Union. If that be the fact, it is as sound law to-day as it was in 1789 that the power to amend is not the power to deprive a State of its reserved powers, including the police power or any part thereof. Such privation of a State can in reason and theory be accomplished only by its assent.

Some of the advocates of this amendment contend that it should have no time limit for ratification by three-fourths of the States. This contention is based on the assumption that a State may reverse its action after having refused to ratify, but once having ratified an amendment it can not change its action. This is supported by the action of Congress in 1868 in declaring that the fourteenth amendment had been ratified by three-fourths of the States, though New Jersey, Ohio, and Oregon declared by resolutions of their legislatures that they withdrew their assent.

If that one example sustains the theory that a State may not withdraw its assent to a constitutional amendment, we still have a constitutional amendment pending before the State legislatures. In 1810 Congress submitted to the States an amendment declaring:

> If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive, or retain any title of nobility or honor, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept and retain any present, pension, office, or emolument of any kind whatever from any emperor, king, prince, or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them or either of them.

This amendment was ratified by 12 States and by the Senate of the South Carolina Legislature. It was assumed that the House of Representatives of South Carolina would vote for ratification, and the amendment was printed as the thirteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution. The South Carolina House of Representatives failed, however, to give an affirmative vote, and the amendment was supported or ratified by only 12 States, one less than the required three-fourths.

If it is the contention that a State once having voted to ratify an amendment can not withdraw its assent, this old amendment submitted by Congress in 1810 must be still pending.

Mr. President, in my opinion, when the people of the different States of the Union come to consider the radical blow which the sovereign rights of the States sustain in the proposition embodied in this joint resolution, it will not be ratified by the necessary three-fourths of the State legislatures.

In the limited time permitted me, Mr. President, I can only refer to the gross inequality which exists in the method by which an amendment to the Constitution is ratified. By referring this joint resolution to the State legislatures it is possible that it should be ratified by 36 States, with 46,000,000 population, against the wishes of 12 States, with 56,000,000 population, thus subjecting the country to the rule of the minority.

Mr. President, we live in an era preeminently of popular government and popular rule; and how long will a great Nation of over 100,000,000 people tolerate a radical legislative act like this, forced upon them by 36 States, representing 46,000,000 population, as against 12 States representing 10,000,000 more, or 56,000,000 population?

The proposition is intrinsically and radically vicious and intolerable. Legislation of this character, in my opinion, ought to be preeminently and primarily of strictly State concern. There are many States now having prohibition laws where the people acquiesce in them more or less willingly; but if those laws had been handed to them by a mandate from a central authority in Washington, the result in many cases would have been resentment and revolution.

The only practical way to establish prohibition or any other police proposition over an area of country is through the agencies of the States. Otherwise it would take an American army to enforce it.

Criticism has been made that it is impossible to enforce prohibition in a State on account of the fact that liquor is brought into the State from outside. That condition, Mr. President, is being gradually corrected.

The last legislation, which seemed to be quite effective, was the so-called Reed bone-dry amendment. I will vote cheerfully, Mr. President, in the Senate to help in every way to secure the passage of laws calculated to protect prohibition States, and to maintain the prohibition status intact in those States; but I do urge that in other States the question should be left to the people to determine for themselves.

Our country, Mr. President, is vast in area and great in population. In the years to come its growth will almost transcend the imagination.

It, in my opinion, will be inevitable that our system of government will break down if we continue the course which has been followed during the last few years of centralizing everything in the Congress of the United States here in Washington. I believe that the doctrine of State rights, which was once so vigorously maintained by great men in this Senate, and concerning which a great civil war was fought, is more important to-day than at any other time in the history of the country, in view of our tremendous growth of population and resources and wealth and diversified interests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The time of the Senator from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. PENROSE. I will ask, Mr. President, in view of the fact that my time is limited, for permission to insert some extracts from Thomas Jefferson, from Mr. Hughes, and others as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> It is not enough that honest men are appointed judges. All know the influence of interest on the mind of man and how unconsciously his judgment is warped by that influence. To this bias add that of the esprit de corps, of their peculiar maxim and creed that "it is the office of a good judge to enlarge his jurisdiction," and the absence of responsibility, and how can we expect impartial decision between the General Government of which they are themselves so eminent a part, and an individual State, from which they have nothing to hope or fear? We have seen, too, that, contrary to all correct example, they are in the habit of going out of the question before them to throw an anchor ahead and grapple further hold for future advances of power. They are then, in fact, the corps of sappers and miners, steadily working to undermine the independent rights of the States, and to consolidate all power in the hands of that Government in which they have so important a freehold estate. But it is not by the consolidation or concentration of powers, but by their distribution that good government is effected. Were not this great country already divided into States, that division must be made that each might do for itself what concerns itself directly, and what it can do so much better than a distant authority. Every State again is divided into counties, each to take care of what lies within its local bounds, each county again into townships or wards to manage minute details, and every ward into farms to be governed by its individual proprietor. Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap, we should soon want bread.
> It is by this partition of cares, descending in gradation from general to particular, that the mass of human affairs may be best managed for the good and prosperity of all. (From Jefferson's Autobiography.)

> But in the face of the difficulties already upon us, and destined to increase in number and gravity, we remain convinced of the necessity of autonomous local governments. An over-centralized government would break down of its own weight. It is almost impossible even now for Congress in well-nigh continuous session to keep up with its duties, and we can readily imagine what the future may have in store in legislative concerns. If there were centered in Washington a single source of authority from which proceeded all the governmental forces of the country—created and subject to change at will—upon whose permission all legislative and administrative action dependent throughout the length and breadth of the land, I think we should swiftly demand and set up a different system. If we did not have States we should speedily have to create them. We now have them, with the advantages of historic background, and in meeting the serious questions of local administration we at least have the advantage of ineradicable sentiment and cherished traditions. And we may well congratulate ourselves that the circumstances of the formation of a more perfect Union has given us neither a confederation of States nor a single centralized Government but a Nation, and yet a Union of States each autonomous in its local concerns. To preserve the essential elements of this system without permitting necessary local autonomy to be destroyed by the unwarranted assertion of Federal power, and without allowing State action to throw out of gear the requisite machinery for unity of control in national concerns demands the most intelligent appreciation of all the facts of our interrelated affairs and far more careful efforts in cooperation than we have hitherto put forth (From address of Charles E. Hughes before the New York State Bar Association, January 14, 1916.)

If the day should ever arrive (which God forbid) when the people of the different parts of our country shall allow their local affairs to be administered by prefects from Washington, and when the self-government of the States shall have been so far lost as that of departments of France, or even so far as that of the counties of England, on that day the progressive political career of the American people will have come to an end, and the hopes that have been built upon it for future happiness and prosperity of mankind will be wrecked forever. (From Prof. John Fiske's Crucial Period of American History.)

IS THERE A LIMIT TO CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT?—CAN ONE STATE'S RESERVED RIGHTS BE TAKEN AWAY BY THE VOTE OF OTHER STATES?

To the EDITOR OF THE SUN:

SIR: The frequency with which the suggestion is made that the Constitution of the United States shall be amended to authorize the Federal Government to exercise powers that may be exercised by the States, but which at least some of them do not choose to exercise, suggests the question whether there lies in the States collectively a right to limit the reserved rights of any of the parties to the compact whose concrete expression is the American Union; whether there are no such exercises of authority as a dispassionate judge would pronounce ultra vires.

It is a fundamental principle of association that charters confer equitable authority to bind with respect only to such matters as are contemplated in their formation; and this restriction is not based on an expressed self-limitation in the documents themselves, but on obvious principles of justice. Yet, while this statement will be generally accepted without question, that charter by which the American Colonies bound themselves originally is, in practice at least, assumed to be an exception to the operation of the principle. Whether it is or not it might be presumptuous to say, but, at any rate, the question is a debatable one whether the thirteen original States entered into the compact with the understanding that their subscription to the Constitution implied that their sovereignty in their reserved rights was thereafter not to be absolute, but contingent on the will of a stated majority to the compact. Due consideration of the circumstances under which the compact was made, as well as of the agreement itself, can, I think, admit of but one conclusion—that they did not; and if this conclusion be valid it follows that, though there is in the Constitution of the United States itself no express limitation of the power to amend, there is in the case of that agreement a natural and necessary limitation in that respect, as well as of the right of legislation by the Federal Government, if any distinction between State and Nation is to be recognized.

Recognizing this distinction, however, one need not be a Marshall to perceive that amendments such as those depriving the States of control over their electorates or compelling them to adopt a prohibition measure are an abuse of the amending power and a violation of the spirit if not of the letter of the Constitution. If the State of Maine, for instance, deems it expedient to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicants within its territory, or the State of Corolado deems it expedient to confer the franchise upon women, they have not been debarred from the exercise of those rights by those States which, like New York, have preferred to adopt a different policy. If three-fourths of the States of the Union wish to adopt the policy of prohibition or universal suffrage they have the unquestioned right to do so within their respective jurisdictions. But if, not satisfied with that, they have the additional right of compelling the minority of "sovereign" States, however much they may be opposed to such a course, however great a hardship it might impose on them, to adopt it also, it is obviously absurd to regard this as a Union of independent Commonwealths that for the purposes of that Union agreed to surrender certain sovereign rights, retaining the rest; there is in principle but one sovereign authority, the Federal authority, of which the States are but administrative subdivisions, because by the process of unlimited amendment all reserved rights may be absorbed in time by the Central Government.

The subject is so profund that one can do no more than advert to it in the compass of a newspaper communication; but if it does not receive greater consideration from layman and legislator alike than it has hitherto commanded, resulting in a more intelligent comprehension by the average man of the character and purpose of the Union, this Government will tend to become what Samuel J. Tilden feared, "Not only the most oppressive but also the most corrupt with which any people has been cursed."

DANGER FOR GOVERNMENT LURKS BEHIND NATIONAL PROHIBITION, WILLIAM HOWARD TAFT SAYS.

BOSTON, MASS., 1914.

National prohibition is a dangerous proposition, said former President William H. Taft, speaking before the Bar Association of Boston at its seventeenth triennial banquet.

It would revolutionize the National Government. It would put on the shoulders of the Government the duty of sweeping the doorsteps of every home in the land. If national prohibition legislation is passed, local government would be destroyed. And if you destroy local government, you destroy one of the things which go to make for a healthy condition of the National Government.

National prohibition is nonenforceable; it is a confession on the part of State governments of inability to control and regulate their own especial business and duty; if the matter were placed under Federal control, it would result in creation of a machinery of Government officials large enough to nominate any President, and would offer too great an opportunity to persons seeking to perpetuate their power in Washington.

[From the New York World, Saturday, May 9, 1914.]

DEMOCRATS AND PROHIBITION.

It ought not to be very difficult for a Democratic Congressman who believes in the fundamental principles of the Democratic Party to make up his mind how to vote on the Hobson resolution submitting a prohibition amendment to the Federal Constitution.

A Democrat can believe in local option or county option, or even in State-wide prohibition, as a measure of moral expediency; but he can not believe in a national prohibition law based on a national prohibition amendment.

That same principle applies to the suffrage question, too.

Ever since there was a Democratic Party Democrats have relegated such issues to the States, and maintained the sovereignty of the States in ordering their own domestic affairs and in establishing the qualifications for voting.

Every State has power to enact a prohibition law for the control of its own people Every State has power to admit women to the suffrage. That is enough.

Many Democratic States have prohibition laws. Some of the States in which women vote are Democratic; but if prohibition and suffrage are to be recognized as pertinent national issues, the States might as well be dismantled first as last and all powers of government centralized in Washington.

[From annual report of the American Historical Association for 1896.]

The provisions of the Constitution forbidding any person holding office under the United States Government without the consent of Congress, from accepting any present or title from any king, prince, or foreign State did not seem sufficiently stringent to some of the State conventions. The ratifying conventions of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, New York, and, later, Rhode Island proposed amendments either forbidding Congress from ever granting its consent, or, for the accomplishment the same end, proposed eliminating the clause "without the consent of Congress." A similar change was proposed in the Senate and twice in the House of the First Congress during the discussion of the subject of amending the Constitution, but failed to meet the approval of either branch. No further amendments on this subject were presented until 1810. Early in that year Senator Reed, of Maryland, introduced an amendment relative to the acceptance of titles of nobility by American citizens.

The resolutions were referred to a select committee of three, and twice afterwards recommended to a larger committee, who finally reported them in a modified form. Several amendments were presented during the debate, one of which was accepted. It was in these words:

"If any citizen of the United States shall accept, claim, receive, or retain any title of nobility or honor, or shall, without the consent of Congress, accept and retain any present, pension, office, or emolument of any kind whatever from any emperor, king, prince, or foreign power, such person shall cease to be a citizen of the United States and shall be incapable of holding any office of trust or profit under them or either of them."

Thus amended, the article passed the Senate by a vote of 19 yeas to 5 nays. The amendment was immediately considered in the House, and passed by that body on the 1st day of May, only three votes being cast against it.

Unfortunately, the Annals of Congress and contemporary newspapers do not give any of the debate upon this interesting proposition. The only light thrown upon the subject by the Annals is the remark of Mr. Macon, who said "he considered the vote on this question as deciding whether or not we were to have members of the Legion of Honor in this country." What event connected with our diplomatic or political history suggested the need of such an amendment is not now apparent.

Possibly there was no particular event which suggested it, but it probably was only another means of expressing that animosity against foreigners and everything foreign which manifested itself in various ways in the trying period just previous to the war of 1812. That the amendment was in the line of popular sentiment may be inferred, otherwise we can not account for the nearly unanimous vote it received in Congress and the favorable reception it met with from the States.

The amendment lacked only the vote of one State of being adopted. It received the ratification of 12 States, and was passed by the Senate of South Carolina. It was generally supposed that the amendment had been concurred in by the requisite majority of the States. In the official edition of the Constitution of the United States, prepared for the use of the Members of the House of Representatives of the Fifteenth Congress, the article appears as the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution. This led to a resolution of inquiry, as a result of which it was discovered that the House of Representatives of South Carolina had not confirmed the action of the senate, and so the amendment had not been adopted. However, the general public continued to think that this amendment had been adopted, and this misconception was perpetuated for over a third of a century in editions of the Constitution and school histories.

WHAT CONSTITUTES THREE-FOURTHS OF THE STATES?

This question first seriously arose at the time the proposition which afterwards was adopted as the thirteenth amendment was before Congress. At that time, several of the States being in rebellion against the Government, they were without representation in Congress. It was held by some that such States should not be counted as included in the Union. Thus we find amendments presented with the following enacting clause: "Be it resolved * * * That upon the ratification of this amendment by three-fourths of the States represented in Congress it shall become valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution."

The question was undecided when the thirteenth amendment was sent to the States. When the legislatures of 27 States had ratified this amendment, which was exactly three-fourths of all the States in the Union, the Secretary of State issued a proclamation declaring it a part of the Constitution. Of these States, however, several had been in rebellion and had not been readmitted to representation in Congress; in fact, it was not until three years later that the majority of them were restored to the full enjoyment of this right. "The question as to whether they could give valid assent to an amendment to the Constitution was one which might possibly be raised." "If they could not participate in the enactment of statute law, how could they participate in the far weightier duty of framing the organic law of the Republic?" In the case of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments the requisite majority was secured through the policy pursued by Congress of requiring from the States late in rebellion, as one of the conditions precedent to their recognition and the admission of their Representatives in the Federal Legislature, the ratification of one, and in most cases both, of these amendments. By this expedient the authoritative settlement of this question was rendered unnecessary.

CAN A STATE RECONSIDER ITS ACTION UPON A CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT?

Three States after giving their consent to the fourteenth amendment, and one after similar action upon the fifteenth amendment, declared through resolutions passed by their legislatures that they withdrew their consent. In all but one of these instances this action was taken before the amendment had been ratified by three-fourths of the legislatures of the several States, and it was contended that such action could be taken previous to the incorporation of the amendment into the Constitution. The Secretary of State, in canvassing the votes upon the fourteenth amendment, being in doubt how such cases should be regarded, issued a certificate reciting the facts and declaring the adoption of the amendment in case the ratification of the two States which had attempted to recall their consent was still to be considered valid. Congress immediately passed a concurrent resolution declaring the ratification of the amendment valid and sufficient, and on the 28th of July, 1868, the Secretary of State issued a second proclamation declaring the amendment to be a part of the Constitution.

On the other hand, in the case of the thirteenth amendment one State which had previously rejected the amendment reconsidered its action. Four similar cases occurred in connection with the fourteenth amendment and two with the fifteenth amendment, some even subsequent to the proclamation declaring the adoption of the respective amendments. All these States where the action had been taken previous to the issuing of such proclamation were included by the Secretary of State in the list of States ratifying.

From the above it would seem that practice has decided that a State having once given its consent, the question is closed, and it can not recall its action; but, on the other hand, that a State that has rejected an amendment can reconsider its action at any time previous to the incorporation of the amendment into the Constitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary to the joint resolution.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment is, on page 2, line 1, after the word "into," to strike out "and" and insert "or."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I want to take 10 minutes to express a view or two on the pending subject; and in view of the fact that a bill at present in conference seeks to stop the manufacture of whisky as a food-conservation proposition, but not to stop the manufacture of beer, I desire to submit just an observation or two on that and other propositions in general relating to the subject. That part of my remarks will consist of questions which some proponents of the liquor traffic may perhaps answer in the further progress of this debate.

Why do we prohibit the boys in the Army and Navy from having booze and insist that those who remain at home shall have it?

If liquor is a bad thing for the boys in the trenches, why is it a good thing for those at home?

When they are willing to die for us, should we not be willing to go dry for them?

Will a sober nation not win the war quicker than a drunken nation?

When the food controller asks everyone in the country to conserve the food supply, why must the food supply going into beer be excepted?

Is it not as much waste of foodstuff to put it into beer as to put it into whisky?

If more foodstuff goes into beer than into whisky, why do we prevent foodstuff going into whisky and permit it going into beer?

Will rebellions come in the cities, as we have been told, if the workers do not have their beer?

Sixty per cent of the Nation, territorially, is dry. Are the feelings of people living in that territory entitled to any consideration?

If the beer drinkers are going to rebel unless they get their beer, will the temperance people rebel unless they get temperance?

Does the rule only work one way?

Why do not the temperance people claim that they will rebel also? No one has heard any such thing from them, nor will anybody hear such thing.

The temperance people will be for the Nation no matter if beer and whisky be forced on them. Their patriotism does not depend on having their own way.

Is patriotism purchased by beer worth while anyway?

If some one were taking as much foodstuff as goes into booze and dumping it into the sea, what would the people of the Nation say?

If some one should advance the argument that this was necessary in order to appease certain people who believed in dumping foodstuffs into the sea, and that if they did not do it it would arouse riots, would we accede to their request?

If some learned Senator, speaking as if the Almighty had delegated to him supreme wisdom and in a tone indicating that such wisdom would perish from the floor when he retired to the cloakroom, should so claim, would we be sufficiently impressed?

Should not hereafter all bulletins issued requesting the people to conserve the food supply urge them also, for the interest of public peace, to have all the foodstuff they could made into beer?

Is it reasonable to ask the temperance people of the country to conserve and save every particle of food and at the same time permit some of it to go into booze?

Is beer more essential to the American people than bread?

What kind of people are they in this country who are not willing to give up their liquor to help their country?

Is the food conservation to be for the benefit of the many, or is it to be limited in order that the few may have their drinks?

Have we reached a point in this country where the war can not be won unless people who drink are permitted to tickle their stomachs with wines and beer?

Will beer patriots win the war anyhow?

Are the interests of brewers in this country more important than the winning of the war?

Are we willing to sacrifice everything in the country to win the war, except beer?

If the temperance forces in the Senate were responsible for delaying the food bill, as charged by certain liquor-interest papers, why is it that the food bill has been delayed for three weeks after the temperance sections of the bill were settled?

With the great demand for labor in this country and the high wages, could there ever be a better time, as far as the laboring men are concerned, for the transition from a wet to a dry Nation?

When there is a shortage of labor in the important and necessary work to carry on the war, why waste labor in making booze?

If booze is essential to win the war, why stop selling it to soldiers?

Mr. President, I have listened to the argument as to State rights; but I have discovered that the doctrine of State rights absolutely vanishes in Congress whenever an appropriation is attached to a bill.

The advance in this country of the temperance cause has been due to the fight against the American saloon. That is what has been at the bottom of it. That has brought us to the issue of national prohibition.

This amendment is to give to the States the right to speak their desire on this question. Why should they not have such right? The American people are tired of the saloon.

No one rises on this floor or elsewhere to defend the American saloon directly.

The American saloon has no conscience. It never did a good act or failed to do a bad one.

It is a trap for the youth; a destroyer for the old; a foul spawning place for crime; a corrupter of politics; knows no party; supports those men for office whom it thinks can be easiest influenced; has no respect for law or the courts; debauches city councils, juries, and everyone it can reach; is powerful in the unity of its vote, and creates cowards in office.

It flatters, tricks, cajoles, and deceives in order to accomplish its purpose; is responsible for more ruin and death than all the wars the Nation has ever engaged in; has corrupted more politics, ruined more lives, widowed more women, orphaned more children, destroyed more homes, caused more tears to flow, broken more hearts, undermined more manhood, and sent more people to an early grave than any other influence in our land.

Its day has come. No subterfuge can long save it. It will be dragged into the open, the influences behind it stripped of their masks. A mighty public conscience is aroused, moving on rapidly, confidently, undismayed, and undeceived. Behind it are the churches of the Nation—Protestant and Catholic—schools, colleges, and homes. This public conscience is not discouraged by defeat or deceived by any cunning devices, by any shams or pretenses. Its cause is the cause of humanity, of righteousness, and God Almighty fights with it.

It has no desire to injure the saloon keeper. It would help him, but it asks no quarter of the saloon and it proposes to give none. The forces fighting the saloon are not composed of mollycoddles. The most far-seeing business minds of the country are in the ranks.

Men will have to take their places in this fight. They can not sit on the fence. This fight is no place for the political coward to stand between the lines. He will be shot from both directions.

No denunciation, no slurs, no jests on the floor of the Senate, no hurling of epithet, no cheap ribaldry in the cloakrooms will stop this fight. It is going on in Congress, and it is going on in the Nation until the tear-producing, orphan-making, home-wrecking, manhood-debauching, character-destroying, hell-filling saloon business is banished from this country. The American saloon is just as certainly doomed as slavery was doomed.

A saloonless Nation means an efficient Nation, better able to cope with any problem threatening it from without or within.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise simply to make a parliamentary inquiry. Under the unanimous-consent agreement can a Senator speak 10 minutes upon the joint resolution and also 10 minutes upon any amendment that may be offered, or is he limited to a single speech of 10 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair thinks that a strict construction of the language of the unanimous-consent agreement might be held to confine every Senator to one speech of 10 minutes upon the joint resolution and amendments. The language of the agreement is:

> And that after Tuesday, July 31, 1917, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon the resolution and amendments offered thereto.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask if an amendment is offered after a Senator has addressed the Senate would he not be permitted to speak 10 minutes on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Iowa and to the Senator from Kansas that the present occupant of the chair, if called upon to construe that language, will hold that the limitation is 10 minutes upon the joint resolution itself and 10 minutes upon any amendment a Senator may get the floor to speak upon; otherwise the agreement would be ineffective to enable Senators to discuss any amendment, should they discuss the joint resolution proper, and would limit Senators to one speech of 10 minutes, which would probably violate the purpose of the Senate in making the agreement.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that the decision of the Chair is in accordance with the understanding in the Senate at the time the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that means, then, that a Senator can speak 10 minutes upon the joint resolution and then he can thereafter speak 10 minutes upon each amendment that may be offered to it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the Chair thinks that a Senator when he addresses the Senate, if the rule is invoked, must address himself to the question before the Senate. There is pending now before the Senate an amendment, and a Senator in theory of law when he speaks now speaks to that amendment. When he has done that, he can not speak again until that amendment is disposed of, and then when he takes the floor again he addresses himself in theory of law to the amendment that is then pending.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite satisfied with the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think the Chair was right in his first interpretation. Although I do not believe the unanimous-consent agreement will bear the construction that he has put on it now, I think it is perfectly proper that we should have an understanding in the beginning. I have no objection, of course, to the ruling indicated by the Chair; but it seems to me the language of the agreement is very plain and that it can not mean two things. If we have an understanding that Senators will be allowed to speak on each amendment as it comes up, I certainly will not object, even though I do not think the construction is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair will state that the discussion of the matter now is more or less academic, as no point of order has been made and no matter is pending that will enable the Chair to determine the matter in a parliamentary way. The Chair is simply indicating the view of the present occupant of the chair out of deference to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who submitted an inquiry.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to say that I think the Chair is strictly within the rule and has put the proper interpretation upon the agreement. I desire to commend that interpretation.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I rise to ask that the pending amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 4, it is proposed to strike out the word "and," the first word in the line, and insert the word "or."

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that the context be read for information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

> SECTION 1. The manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 1, after the word "from," to strike out the comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 3, after the word "purposes," to strike out "are" and insert "is."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 5, after the word "legislation," to strike out "and nothing in this article shall deprive the several States of their power to enact and enforce laws prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors."

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, as I introduced the joint resolution originally, I will say that the language stricken out by the committee was added by me in order to emphasize and make plain what was really an existing condition. The Judiciary Committee, with practical unanimity, said that the States would not be deprived of the power to enact and enforce laws prohibiting the traffic in intoxicating liquors, and therefore did not deem it advisable to place it in the joint resolution. I trust, therefore, that the amendment will be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair informs the Senate that the joint resolution is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before the final vote is taken I desire to express briefly my reasons for the vote that I am going to cast upon this joint resolution.

I yield to no man in the desire to promote genuine temperance in my State and in the Union. I have tried to, and I think I always have lived a temperate life. I believe in living and letting live. I have an intense admiration for the genius of our institutions. I do not believe that the fundamental principles of our people have changed. I believe in democracy. I believe that the principles of democracy are best conserved when we deal with all subjects in a spirit of moderation rather than by following the extremist on either side of any question. I always try to have before me as my guide not the view of the extremist on any subject, but I am intensely interested in knowing what the average man in my State thinks, and I always try to keep before me a picture of the composite Ohioan as I see him. Now, the question is, What is my duty to my constituency as I am permitted to see it? That leads me to review for a moment the conditions as they prevail in Ohio, and I am going to beg the indulgence of the Senate for just a few minutes while I advert to them.

This is no new question in Ohio. We have had it before us for many years, and we will continue perhaps to have it for many years, whichever way it is decided. In the year 1912 most of us thought that the question was settled at least for a few years. That year we voted upon 42 amendments to the constitution. All but two or three were adopted. One of the amendments involved the question of licensing the saloon. At that time in our State we had residential local option, township local option, municipal local option, and county local option. When this vote came before the public most of those, and I think all of those who were leaders in the councils of the Prohibition Party, were opposed to the license amendment. There was only about 50 per cent of the total vote cast on the license amendment. There were for the license system 273,361 votes; against it, 188,823 votes. The majority for license was 84,538.

Again, in 1914, our people were called upon to vote upon the prohibition question. The election was held November 3, 1914. The vote against the prohibition amendment was 588,329; the vote for it, 504,177. The majority against prohibition was 85,152.

In 1915 we voted upon it again. The vote that year against prohibition was 540,377; in favor of it, 484,969; the majority against prohibition was 55,408.

Mr. President, at the present time in Ohio we have residential district local option, township local option, municipal local option, and there is now pending before the people of our State a prohibition amendment which will be voted upon this fall.

Under the Ohio constitution our people have the right by petition to initiate an amendment to the constitution or new laws on this subject. They have full power, therefore, at any time to adopt prohibition or new legislation when they see fit so to do.

In my judgment, I must either ignore what seems to be the voice of Ohio, as evidenced by the result of the elections I have just referred to, by voting for this amendment, or I must vote in favor of what I believe is the judgment of the people of Ohio by voting against it.

Have we arrived at that state of mind on this or any other question when the majority of the people in any State shall not have any voice in determining what changes in the fundamental law shall be proposed?

I know that the cry is made that it ought to be referred to the people, and many of the people in the country to-day are of the opinion that when we adopt this joint resolution and refer the matter to the States the people will have a right to vote upon it. Of course all men who are informed know that the people of the several sovereign States will have no opportunity to vote upon this amendment; but it is a question, under the plan proposed here, which will address itself solely to the legislatures of the several States, who may or may not be elected upon the prohibition issue, or who may be elected upon other issues quite as well as upon this one.

The State of Kansas claimed the right to vote as she saw fit, without let or hindrance by any State of the Union, when she decided this question for herself. The State of Texas claims that right. The State of Washington claims that right. The State of Michigan claims that right; and, sirs, if they had the right, it seems to me that the people of Ohio should have the right to determine the liquor question for themselves.

And now, if I may, in the few minutes allowed me, I want to call attention to another proposition.

In 1910 the 13 States of Nevada, Wyoming, Delaware, Arizona, Idaho, New Mexico, Vermont, Utah, Montana, New Hampshire, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Oregon had, all told, 4,657,052 people. The State of Ohio had 4,767,121. In other words, in the year 1910 Ohio had 110,069 more people than the 13 States I have named. Yet if this amendment is to be submitted to the States for their votes, these 13 States, with less population than the State of Ohio, will have thirteen times as much voice as the State of Ohio in determining whether or not this amendment shall be added to the Constitution.

Again, 18 States—Nevada, Wyoming, Delaware, Arizona, Idaho, New Mexico, Vermont, Utah, Montana, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, North Dakota, South Dakota, Oregon, Maine, Florida, Colorado, and Connecticut—had, in 1910, 8,608,432 people; but the State of New York in that year had 9,113,614 people, or 505,182 more people than the 18 States I have named. Let me ask those who believe in democratic institutions since when has it come to pass that upon a question of this kind the principles of American government would permit these 18 States to have eighteen times the voice that New York shall have in amending the Constitution, if this amendment is to be submitted?

Inasmuch as Ohio in 1914 voted against prohibition by a majority of 85,152, and again in 1915, when a less vote was cast, by a majority of 55,408, thereby declaring her sentiments on the subject, how can I, as one of her Senators, vote for this resolution and put up to the people of the country the prohibition question in such form that we in Ohio will have only one-thirteenth as much influence in the adoption or rejection of prohibition as a fewer number of people in the 13 States of the Union to which I referred a moment ago, or thereby give to New York only one-eighteenth as much influence in determining this question as a fewer number of people in the 18 States which I have named? Surely the majority of voters in Ohio have some rights to be considered. Surely as their representative in the Senate I ought to bear this fact in mind in casting my vote.

Let me put the question in another form. If it were proposed to offer an amendment to the Constitution, the object of which was to permit the manufacture and sale of liquor in each of the States of the Union, would Senators representing dry States feel themselves justified in voting for that resolution because a substantial minority of the electors in their State wanted them to so do? Would not they feel bound by the majority sentiment in their States? If that be their position, am I less bound by the majority sentiment in my State? My belief is that in matters which are so intimately related to the habits of the people, each elector should have the same right to determine the question as any other elector, no matter what his views might be on the subject.

In my judgment the result will be much more satisfactory if this question is left to the people of each individual State to determine the kind of legislation they want upon the subject. For these reasons, in brief, I feel compelled to vote against the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Ohio has expired.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I ask leave to attach to my remarks the tables that I have here, showing the population in the several States named.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, ever since the beginning of the world this old world has been steadily becoming better; a better place in which to live; a better place for humanity. Ever since the creation of man, mankind has been steadily pressing onward, forward, upward; slowly, awkwardly, stumblingly, toilsomely, painstakingly; painfully and discouragingly slow has been its progress, in the face of innumerable difficulties and beset with almost insuperable obstacles; but ever onward and upward; often stumbling, falling, slipping backward, but ever animated by hope and faith in the future, mankind has progressed steadily forward and upward. Man's face has ever been set to brighter and better conditions.

The desire of man for the betterment of his condition is heaven born and God given and can be no more taken out of his breast than he can be bereft of his inborn desire for liberty, for freedom. In all the ages since the creation of the world the steady effort of mankind has been to climb out of the miasma, the mire, the fog, the darkness, the murkiness of the lowlands, the fog of ignorance, the fetters of tradition, and to attain the heights of the mountain peaks, where God's bright sunshine of reason exists, and where the pure air is that of freedom and liberty.

In making progress to that end, mankind has had to contend with ignorance, superstition, tradition; has been fettered by the obstacles of avarice, greed, cupidity, oppression; but always looking up to the heights where is the sunshine and bright light of the future, where there are better conditions awaiting man's efforts.

As results of long and toilsome struggle, we witness many improvements in the condition of mankind. Slavery, once prevalent nearly all over the world, is now happily abolished, and scarcely anywhere on the earth does there exist human bondage, except as punishment for crime; and who would go back to human slavery? Yet its abolition was the result not only of centuries but of thousands of years of steady, persistent effort; of awakened conscience, in the face of tradition, immemorial sanction, and the efforts of man to subvert to his use even his fellow human beings, everything that might come to his hand.

In making every improvement of human conditions, mankind has had to contend with avarice, greed, and every sordid element of human nature, but nevertheless mankind's progress has ever been onward and upward, and every century has marked progress in man's travel toward the betterment of humanity.

Feudalism, once dominant in nearly all the nations of the earth, so that a few owned nearly all of the land and the many were mere vassals, has disappeared from the face of the earth. Religious freedom is a thing that was once unknown on the face of the earth. Now happily it prevails in nearly every quarter of the globe, to the betterment of mankind, making the world a freer and better world in which to live, and making better conditions for humanity. Now, in nearly every quarter of the globe man may worship God as his conscience may dictate, and his worship is a free worship, not enforced worship. What centuries of struggle it took to bring about that happy condition.

The sacred right of kings was once prevalent all over the earth and was acknowledged as a necessity of government in every quarter of the earth. In fact, it had Biblical sanction; it had the sanction of everybody, and it was necessary in early centuries. The people then were not capable of self-government. Nobody questioned it. Fortunately the divine right of kings to rule is rapidly crumbling and fading away, and I believe in a few generations more will be wiped from the face of the earth. So may it be!

Formerly education was not prevalent nor general in the countries of the world. Even in our own country at the beginning of its existence it was generally held that "it is not my duty to see that my neighbor's children are educated; let them grow up in ignorance; that is the outlook of their parents; I have nothing to do with it." It is now realized that man may no longer say, "I am not my brother's keeper." Fortunately, early in the history of our country common-school education, public-school education at the expense of the Government, was provided for, and happily it has proven one of the greatest factors for liberty and freedom and enlightened self-government that the world has ever known.

In our own country, in the last 130 or 140 years, many notable achievements in the progress of mankind have been made. One hundred years and more ago, the right of suffrage in nearly all the States was confined to those who owned property, to freeholders. Happily that was abolished early in the history of our country, and ever since then suffrage has been becoming more general, more dependent upon intelligence, upon the capacity of the voter, and extended to all who acquired sufficient intelligence to exercise it properly. To-day we have in a large number of the States of our Union universal suffrage, for men and women alike, and I believe the time is coming in the near future when there will be in this country universal suffrage by an amendment to our Federal Constitution.

There are many things which are now on the statute books of our country by virtue of national legislation which in the beginning of our history were not considered proper subjects of national legislation. Pure-food control, sanitation, child-labor regulation, limitation of hours of labor for men, women, and children—all these things were attained in the face of intense opposition. It took time and toilsome effort. The people in attaining them were fettered by traditions of the dark ages of the past, but by persistent effort they emerged and came out in the bright sunlight of a better day.

I believe that the people of this country, through an enlightened conscience and a sounder public opinion, have about arrived at a point where they are ready to adopt by a national constitutional amendment national prohibition of the manufacture and use of liquor. The time has come to strike for it. The people are ready to pass on it. They want a chance. It is the sense of an enlightened public, sustained by the best professional and scientific authorities, that the use of liquor has no merit in it, neither as food nor medicine. It is neither food nor medicine. It is a palpable evil, socially, physically, morally, politically, economically. The progress in this reform has been slow, but steady and sure, and I believe the day for marking the milepost of that achievement is finally at hand.

In regard to the argument that if three-fourths of the States adopt this constitutional provision the people of the remaining one-fourth of the States of the Union will be at their mercy, I simply have to say that when any State came into the Union it knew the provisions of our Federal Constitution. It did so with its eyes open. It accepted the conditions. It knew there was a provision in the Federal Constitution that constitutional amendments might be submitted and that if ratified by three-fourths of the States the other one-fourth would have to submit to it as the dominant law of the land. There was nothing to compel any State to come into the Union. Any one of the Thirteen Colonies which did not like that provision in the proposed Federal Constitution could have remained out of the Federal Union, and in that even would be to-day a sovereign, independent, separate, individual nation. The Colonies exercised their choice. They came into the Union to get all the benefits of a consolidated Union of States and of our Federal Constitution, and if they get the benefits they must submit to all the provisions which were inserted for the common welfare of all. There is nothing to argument to the contrary. Ohio did not have to come into the Union. Montana did not have to come into the Union. They could have stayed out. Having come in voluntarily, they must submit to the Federal scheme of government and should not complain about it. I am for this amendment and shall support it. I believe it will be submitted, and the day it is ratified by three-fourths of the States, as I believe it will be in time, will be a great day for humanity. It will put us on a higher plane than we have ever occupied. It will be a greater day than the day that witnessed the abolition of human slavery. It will be a second Declaration of Independence. It should be observed ever after as a second Fourth of July May God speed the day!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Montana has expired.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in view of the limited time at my command, I must select a phase of the several questions involved in the resolution now before the Senate, and I select for an observation that phase of the general matter presented by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. Their view of it is that the power to deal with this question should remain with the States; that it is ill advised for the General Government to assume the control of the habits and customs of the people in this regard. I am compelled to disagree entirely and utterly with their view of the question. If there is one matter concerning which the United States should have the right of legislation and control, it is with regard to the use of intoxicating liquor.

Many things have become national, Mr. President, since our forefathers adopted the Constitution in 1789, and this is one of them. Every vital matter of legislation, every question which now deeply concerns the people of the United States, finds its way eventually to the Congress of the United States. It is for the Federal power to make this country great or contemptible. It is for the Federal power to give this country stability or confer upon it weakness. The General Government is vastly more concerned in the habits of the people, in their strength, in their sobriety, in their efficiency, than any State government can be.

The people of my State are just as much involved in the conduct of the people of the State of New York as are the people of New York themselves, because in the great consensus of opinion that is finally expressed in national legislation comes either safety or danger not only for the people of New York but for the people of Iowa as well.

If it is true that the Republic will better serve its high mission in the world through sobriety than through the use of intoxicating liquors intemperately then it is for the Republic to erect a standard which shall control the habits, customs, and manners of the people.

Mr. President, the view so honestly, I have no doubt, expressed by the Senator from New York and the Senator from Pennsylvania upon this subject can not be accepted in these days when the influence of the State so far as the world is concerned has well-nigh disappeared and the influence of the Republic alone is potential in determining our destiny. I repeat, if there is one subject which ought to be within the complete control of the Federal power it is the subject involved in the resolution.

I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from New York upon one phase of the matter—especially do I agree with the view taken by the Senator from Pennsylvania—that there is an element of inequity in permitting 36 States with a population of 46,000,000 to override the wishes of 12 States with a population of 56,000,000. Our forefathers, however, have determined that for us. There is no other way to amend the Constitution at the present time.

I recall to the memory of Senators the fact that four or five years ago I introduced a resolution for an amendment to the Constitution providing that a referendum through which a proposed amendment should be adopted or rejected should be taken by popular vote. I believe in that amendment to the Constitution now, but I found it utterly impossible to secure a favorable report upon the resolution from the Committee on the Judiciary. Why? Because of the influence of the very States which are now complaining with regard to the present method of ratifying constitutional amendments. I think not only ought a referendum to be by a popular vote, but I think that the citizens of the United States in their individual capacity ought to have the right to initiate amendments to the Constitution, and when they have initiated those amendments, supported by a fair and reasonable proportion of the people, they ought to be submitted for adoption without regard to the Congress of the United States. Logically and properly considered the Congress of the United States ought to have no more to do with an amendment to the Constitution than any other collection of citizens of similar number. Such is my answer to the contention that this particular power should remain with the States.

Mr. President, I do not intend at this moment to discuss the policy of prohibition. I may, if I have an opportunity, speak of it a little later, but I would vote to submit this amendment to the people or to the States even though I did not believe in the policy of prohibition. I believe it is the duty of Members of Congress, when they find there is a fair and reasonable demand upon the part of the people for an opportunity to express their opinions regarding an amendment to the Constitution, to submit it irrespective of our individual judgment or opinion upon the merits.

I am one of those who think that our forefathers made the way altogether too difficult for constitutional amendments. I do not think they ought to be submitted for light or trivial reasons. I do not think they ought to be submitted unless there is found a fair and decent proportion of the people urging or soliciting an opportunity to express themselves with regard to their organic law. We take ourselves, I think, altogether too seriously and impute to ourselves a guardianship of the Constitution which we ought no longer to hold or to exercise. It is the Constitution of the people of the United States; and when, as I said before, a reasonable proportion of the people want a chance to vote upon an amendment to it, it is our highest duty to see that they have the chance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Iowa has expired.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have listened with some surprise to the speeches of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. One would imagine from these speeches that the friends of this measure were proceeding in some way not authorized by the Constitution, when, as a matter of fact, the friends of this resolution are proceeding in the only regular way to amend the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution provides that—

> The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress.

All the friends of this proposition are doing is to ask that this question shall be submitted in the regular way. The Senators might just as well complain about the representation in the United States as to complain that three-fourths of the States shall not have the right to amend the Constitution because their population might be less than that of the one-fourth unfavorable to the amendment of the Constitution. In this body, while the great State of Kansas may not equal the State of Pennsylvania in ability in its representation, yet we equal the State of Pennsylvania in our vote. The State of Kansas equals the vote of New York and all the other more heavily populated States, and it is right that we should have equal power with our vote. The Senators from Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, New York, Ohio, and Alabama might just as well complain of the vote we have and the power that the State of Kansas has here.

Mr. President, I am going to vote for the submission of this amendment because I am personally in favor of it and believe it to be right to submit the question to the States. In the second place, I am going to vote for it because it carries out the sentiments of a vast majority of the people of the State I have the honor in part to represent.

But, Mr. President, I desire to say a word or two in regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. I should like ordinarily to have this question submitted without limitation, but I have taken the pains to carefully go over the situation in the Senate with the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and other friends of this proposition, and I am satisfied from the canvass we have made that there are several Senators who would like to vote for this amendment and who will vote for it if the limitation is put in requiring the State to act within six years. Without that provision some of them may vote against it. I am satisfied that without the provision the vote will be very close, and to assure the passage of this resolution to-day I am going to vote for that limitation, because I believe we should waive our personal opinion on questions of this kind if we can help the passage of the provision thereby.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator in his time unless it is agreeable to him.

Mr. CURTIS. It is perfectly agreeable.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think it right to tack a proposition of this kind upon the resolution when we have not attempted to do it on any other proposed amendment of the Constitution?

Mr. CURTIS. I would vote the same way on other amendments if the conditions were similar, and I think there should be a limitation upon all questions submitted.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator believe that there is any Member of the Senate who is opposed to the prohibition amendment who does not favor that proposition? In other words, it is favored by the enemies of the proposition?

Mr. CURTIS. I would not say that. It is favored by some of the Senators who desire to vote for the resolution but do not care to vote for it unless this limitation is put in it.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think that any Senator is in favor of that limitation on it because he believes by that means he can defeat the amendment?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not know.

Mr. NORRIS. What other reason could there be?

Mr. CURTIS. So far as I am concerned, I believe that this amendment will be adopted by three-fourths of the States in the legislatures of 1921. The very first chance the States get to vote upon this question, in my judgment, they will settle it; and if this fight can not be won in 6 years, in my opinion, it can not be won in 16 years. For that reason also I am going to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I had not intended to speak of any of these amendments, but ever since the offering of the amendment by the Senator from Ohio to this proposition, although that amendment is not now technically before the Senate, I have felt that Senators who are friendly to the prohibition amendment are making a mistake if they support the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. I am finding no fault as to the offering of the amendment. If I were opposed to this joint resolution, I should certainly be for the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, because it gives to those who are opposed to the adoption of this constitutional amendment a last chance. If for six years they can prevent the favorable action of enough States, so that the three-fourths for the ratification of this amendment shall be lacking, they will have defeated the amendment.

I am in favor of the proposition of the Senator from Ohio as a general amendment. If we should add that kind of an amendment to the Constitution as a limitation which should apply to every proposed constitutional amendment, there would be some reason, it seems to me, to put it through. I believe there ought to be some limitaton; but why select this particular amendment and attach that kind of a limitation to it? Why not make the limitation general; put it through the Senate as a general amendment, and let it apply to every proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States? It seems to me that would be the only fair thing to do.

There is another reason why this amendment ought not to be tacked onto this proposed constitutional amendment. While I have not had the opportunity to examine any of the decisions of the courts on the subject, it seems to me that the amendment is of very doubtful constitutionality. The Constitution of the United States provides how the Constitution may be amended, but it places no limitation whatever as to the time within which the States may act through their legislatures upon any amendment which may be submitted by Congress. Now it is proposed here to put in reality into the Constitution, having the same effect as amending the Constitution, an amendment providing that the time for the ratification of this particular amendment on prohibition shall be limited. The proposition has, in my judgment, neither fairness nor reason behind it. I confess I am surprised that the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], and others like him, who have been fathering this proposition and who are the leaders in this contest, have surrendered to influences of that kind and have agreed to put on here an amendment which, in my judgment, means the defeat of the constitutional amendment, even though it receives a two-thirds majority in both branches of the National Legislature and is submitted to the States.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it is my purpose to vote against the submisson of this proposition to the States; and having but a limited time in which to discuss the proposition, I want to give the reasons, so far as I can within that time, for my action.

The pending question is one which should be considered by Congress solely on its merits and not on the assumption that it has reached a state of agitation and resulting favor which justifies its being submitted to the States without any reference to the individual opinions of Senators as to the advisability of such action. When a referendum is submitted in a State the people of that State have an opportunity to decide what action they wish to take; and, while I think that in many cases they decide public questions without the knowledge and information they should have before passing on proposed laws, yet it is their own fault if they do not decide the question wisely. This case is entirely different, and it should not be misunderstood by Senators, many of whom seem to have the impression that in passing along this important question to the States they are performing their full duty.

It is true that the advocates of national prohibition—very largely those connected with the Anti-Saloon League—are urging this matter and doing so with the argument that they are not asking any Member of Congress to declare that he is in favor of national prohibition, but simply that he shall not "become an avowed exponent and protector of the liquor traffic by refusing to vote to allow the people of the Nation, by States, through their Representatives, to determine this question." The proposed action to be taken by Congress in this matter is not a function similar to that performed by a Cabinet officer in performing some ministerial duty, but it is proposing an amendment to the Constitution, to be adopted by a two-thirds vote of the Senate and House of Representatives, and then for a long time leaving the question in the hands of the States, to be finally determined by their respective legislatures. Even if three-fourths of the States in the end should indorse this proposition I suggest that it is distinctly different from submitting the question to the people, for by the census of 1910 the population of three-fourths of the States of the Union is only about 41,000,000 and the population of the remaining 12 States is 51,000,000. Therefore this question might be decided in favor of national prohibition even though a very large majority of the people of the country were opposed to it.

Too much emphasis can not be placed on the grotesqueness of this proposition advanced under the catchword "Let the people rule." As I have suggested, the people need not necessarily rule in deciding a matter of this sort, and, moreover, the division between prohibition States and those opposed to prohibition is very largely along the lines of size of the State, and therefore is essentially contrary to the policy of letting the people rule. Why should the 90,000 people in Nevada have the same weight that the 9,000,000 people of New York have in determining what the social customs and practices of the 9,000,000 people of New York shall be in a matter of this kind? Then it must not be forgotten that while there are two distinctly differing interests in this matter—those who are constitutionally opposed to the sale of liquor, believing it to be without excuse, and those engaged in the liquor business—yet, as a matter of fact, these two classes comprise a very small part of the population of the country, and it is unfair and unreasonable to include those who oppose this measure—a measure which is of momentous importance in connection with our organic law—among the exponents and protectors of the liquor traffic. There are millions of people in the United States who do not sell liquor, but who do occasionally like to drink it; there are other millions who are quite indifferent to drinking, but who believe it unwise and inexpedient to interfere with the action of other citizens in such matters, and they honestly believe that national compulsion in a matter of this sort, where every State wishing to be dry is now fully protected in its rights, is a disastrous blunder.

Climatic, racial, and social conditions, as well as density of population, vary so greatly that a solution which might logically apply to the smaller and more sparsely settled States would not apply with equal force to the larger States, and especially in those States having cities with great populations, like Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Cleveland, Detroit, Chicago, and St. Louis. If this question could be referred directly to the people and all of the people of the country could vote for or against it, Senators might be justified in avoiding their duty, but not otherwise.

I am now, and always have been, a believer in local option, and firmly believe that this is a question which should be decided by the people of the several States in accordance with their own wishes. The police powers are inherent in the States, and the question of controlling the sale of spirits largely comes within that constitutional provision.

Formerly there was some logic in the position taken by many that if liquor were sold in any States it could be shipped into other States against the wishes of the people of the States that had adopted prohibition. That condition has been cured by the Webb-Kenyon bill, for which I voted, which prohibits the shipment of liquor into dry territory; and the act making this prohibitive has been declared constitutional by the Supreme Court, so there is no possibility of such complaint if the officers of the States are attending to their duties.

Moreover, in order to prevent or discourage the purchase of liquor in dry territory, a bill passed Congress last winter prohibiting the carrying by mail of newspapers into dry territory if they contained liquor advertisements. I voted for that bill, and I shall vote for any other legislation to protect the desires of those living in territory which has become dry.

One of the serious weaknesses of this proposed measure is that it may be brought before the legislatures of the several States as many times as its proponents desire, or until the legislatures of three-fourths of the States are found favorable to the proposition. If it were submitted at one time, it might be found that the legislatures of 25 or 30 States would be favorable to it and the legislatures of the other States unfavorable; but it can be brought up again and again in the States which have not adopted the provision until a legislature may be found, years hence, favorable to it. By that time, there might be legislatures in some of the States which had adopted the amendment unfavorable to it, but they could not retrace their steps. That makes the whole question a constant irritant in connection with our elections, distracting attention from the issues which divide political parties, and very largely breaking down the party spirit and action which I believe essential to the best interests of the Republic. I need not cite any other instance of that condition than that found in the State of Maine, where prohibition has prevailed for substantially 50 years—a prohibition which most people admit has not prohibited, largely because the law officers have not performed their full duty, but really because the sentiment of the State, or of localities within the State, has been against prosecutions for violations of the law.

No law can be enforced unless it accords with public sentiment; in fact, when a law does not conform to public sentiment, ordinarily, there is no attempt to enforce it. We have a good illustration of that in the law passed a few years ago by Congress regulating the speed of automobiles in the District of Columbia, limiting their speed to 12 miles an hour, and this law was passed largely at the instance and urging of those unfamiliar with automobile traffic. It is unnecessary to say to the Senate that this law is violated by every automobilist in the District of Columbia every day he uses his automobile, and unless an automobilist indulges in excessive or unreasonable speed no attention whatever is paid to it. Therefore, while the law is neglected, it becomes positively harmful, because it begets a disregard for all law and creates a tendency to evade reasonable statutes.

No one has stated the difficulties incident to the enforcement of liquor laws in large communities better than Hon. Newton D. Baker, the present Secretary of War, whose conclusions were reached as a result of his experience as mayor of Cleveland. In a contribution to the Atlantic Monthly for July, 1915, he said:

> All this shows the wrought-up state of the public mind on the liquor question. Into such a divided society the Anti-Saloon Leagues and other organized temperance bodies, by their control of the rural vote, bring regulations, wise enough and moderate enough for the country districts and small towns, but violently disruptive of the settled habits of large city populations. These regulations the police are to enforce. If they do, the executive under whom they act is frequently voted promptly out of office; if they do not, the more excitable and sensational ministers and other excellent but hasty people conclude and proclaim that the executive and police alike are in corrupt collusion with the forces of evil, and the lines are laid for a municipal campaign in which all the great interests of the city are lost in the question whether the respective candidates for mayor are "fanatics" or "liberals."

Those familiar with Maine politics will justify me in saying that during all this time prohibition has prevailed in Maine it has been one of the campaign issues which, perhaps, has been discussed more than any other question and has prevented in many instances men making their natural political alignments. I personally believe that one of the most desirable conditions in our form of Government is that there shall be two active, vigorous, contesting political parties, divided along the lines of industrial and other questions forming the usual basis for political differences, and that introducing any questions into our political life which distracts from those conditions breaks down political parties and, therefore, is essentially harmful.

I do not wish to unnecessarily emphasize the financial phase of this question, for if all the people of the country could decide that they prefer to raise the revenue incident to this business in some other way I should not care to advance that argument in any form, but, as a matter of fact, it has been a large factor in our national revenues, and when we return to normal times we shall find some difficulty and a good deal of opposition to substituting other sources of revenue for it. Neither can the revenue question be entirely confined to national receipts; they are important in a local way. All large cities, which vote more or less frequently on this subject and vote for the maintenance of a license system, obtain from this source a very considerable revenue, which will be taken from them against their will if this proposition prevails. Then, again, there is no attempt made by the proponents of this legislation to make provision for any compensation on account of the destruction of a business which has continued to exist during the entire life of the Republic by national license. I am opposed to confiscation of property in any form at any time, whether or not I entirely approve of the individuals engaged in this business or the character of the business conducted. When we propose confiscation we are inaugurating a policy which is likely to be most far-reaching in its effect. Some one may conclude that some other form of business is not entirely for the public interest, and the fact that we have established a confiscation precedent may result in its being extended to other fields.

Finally, it seems to me that the individual has rights which should be protected. The vast majority of those who indulge in stimulants, in these days especially, do so to a very moderate degree. I am not satisfied that the multitudinous statistics which are given out about the harm coming from wines and light beers are well founded. Prof. William T. Sedgwick, president of the American Public Health Association, in commenting on public-health boards, says:

> Their knowledge is based wholly on experiments on animals, or on statistical data of one sort or another. Medical science is now prepared to show how unreliable these two sources are in solving this problem.

There are innumerable things in which we indulge which are undoubtedly more or less harmful to individuals, and I think that statement would be equally true in its application to food consumed in unreasonable quantities and at unreasonable times. When the rights of individuals who are temperate are taken from them, not by those living within the same political division or even by the same number of people in some other political section, it seems to me that the action is illogical, unfair, and from every standpoint undesirable. I firmly believe that the world is advancing satisfactorily in its relation to this question; that the good old times are a myth, as far as it is concerned; that the modern business man or professional man will not tolerate in an associate or employee a failure to observe proper temperance rules; and anyone who observes the social practices of to-day and compares them with those of 25 years ago must readily admit that gradually we are coming to a real temperance in the use of all forms of stimulants, and a temperance which not only satisfies the individual but does no real injustice to the community. Progressing as we are in this respect, it seems to me particularly unfortunate that what many will consider an unreasonable course is likely to be taken by the National Government. They will resent it, and properly so, in my opinion. I honestly believe that this ill-advised attempt, if it succeeds, will be harmful rather than beneficial to real temperance. I hope not, as far as I am concerned, because I shall be glad to see moderation in the use of stimulants as in all other matters, but I am fearful that the result will be unsatisfactory even to those who are most urgent in pressing this proposition.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk, so that it may be pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 9, after the word "sale," it is proposed to insert "purchase, use."

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, the joint resolution of the Senator from Texas proposing an amendment to the Constitution prescribes, without reading the preliminary part:

> ARTICLE —, SECTION 1. The manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

I have proposed by the amendment which has just been read to amend this section so that it shall read as follows:

> The manufacture, sale, purchase, use, or transportation—

If the amendment I have suggested is agreed to, we will not only prohibit the manufacture, sale, transportation, and importation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes but also prohibit, if this article should be ratified by the requisite number of States, the purchase and use of intoxicating liquors.

It is hard for me to see why it should be made unlawful to sell an article and not equally unlawful to buy it. It is hard for me to see why, if the manufacture and sale are to be forbidden, the purchase ought not also to come under the ban of the law. It is impossible for me to understand why, if it is to be unlawful to manufacture and to sell it, to buy it and transport it, to import it or export it, it ought not also to be unlawful to use it.

Now, if we are going to perform this task thoroughly, if we are going to work it out completely, let us go the whole length while we are at it; let us prohibit not only the exportation, importation, transportation, and sale, but the purchase as well, and if all those things are to be forbidden, let us forbid its use as well. That is complete prohibition, practical prohibition, and it seems to me those who are so anxious to give the people real prohibition ought to be willing to vote for the amendment; that is, if they are really for real prohibition.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to ask the Senator if that would not accentuate rather than lessen the evils which he presented so ably to the Senate yesterday with reference to the fundamental objections which the Senator has to the joint resolution?

Mr. HARDWICK. The answer is perfectly plain. It will be impossible for the Senator from Georgia to vote for this proposition, because it is inherently wrong, according to his viewpoint, and he could not vote for it, with or without the amendment; but from the standpoint of those who advocate this proposal and who can get their own consent to support the proposition surely there ought to be no objection to an effort to perfect it, even though it comes from a Senator who can not support it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not think it would be more difficult to secure a conviction or to secure evidence of an illegal sale if the purchase of it also were made illegal, because the witness, who, as a rule, is the purchaser, would be protected from answering on the ground that the answer might incriminate himself.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not think that is true. It seems to me that evidence could be obtained without that. The people who buy very rarely give evidence anyway.

Mr. NORRIS. Never willingly; but, as a rule, in the prosecutions for the illegal sale of liquor the purchaser is a witness, although an unwilling one. If the Senator's amendment were agreed to——

Mr. HARDWICK. That could be very easily provided for. The witnesses could be given immunity by a statute Congress might pass. The joint resolution provides that power is conferred on Congress to pass appropriate legislation to carry out this amendment. If we find any serious trouble of that kind, we can provide immunity for witnesses of the character suggested by the Senator. But it strikes me, Mr. President, that it is utterly and entirely dishonest to say that we will make it unlawful to sell this article and not equally unlawful to buy it. It strikes me that it is utterly and totally insincere and uncandid to say that we are going to make the manufacture, sale, importation, exportation, and transportation of this article unlawful, and yet are unwilling to make its use unlawful.

While I am not for this proposition, and can not support it, for the reasons I explained to the Senate yesterday, it does seem to me that we ought to perfect it and make it a rounded proposition before we vote on it, whether we intend to vote for it or against it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, hitherto in the world's wars disease and vice have been more destructive than the sword. Modern surgery and science have mitigated or cured or successfully avoided disease and treated wounds. The most signal chapter in history is written by the patient searcher in the realms of medicine and surgery. What a mighty debt humanity owes the physician and surgeon and all those who in the laboratory and by ceaseless experiment have given their effort to enlarge the science, the art, and the skill to save life! They toil to preserve mankind from his follies and his crimes. The warrior strives to destroy. One fans the flickering spark of life to renewed vitality and returns its possessor to live his allotted span. The other kills and ruthlessly destroys multitudes and cuts short the lives of nations. Marble and bronze rise to blazon the warrior's deeds, but comparatively few memorial shafts proclaim the preservative and enduring greatness of the physician, the surgeon, and the scientist. Mankind is yet constituted so as to make a hero of those who spill blood and consign to oblivion those who save life.

The Governments of the earth have promptly adopted all that medicine and surgery have offered for disease and injuries. The vices more insidious and deadly than disease or wounds are left by human government to work their destruction unchecked and unheeded, in peace or war. Why does Congress leave vice to besiege our Army and disable our men in the great struggle for free government?

Drunkenness is the monarch of all human vices. Other evils are its mere satellites. It permeates and poisons and rots every department of life and every avenue and faculty of the human body. Once in a distant age intoxicating liquor was the supposed instrument of fellowship and good cheer. It is now the debased and adulterated instrument for the exploitation for profit and the promotion of personal vices. It has grown to astounding proportions. The longer it continues the greater its evil and the more potent its strength. It has intrenched itself with human avarice and become its ally to exploit the pitiable weakness of humanity to accumulate fortunes. The men who have made it their instrument of pecuniary gain have assumed to control political parties, to threaten candidates, to decide elections, to administer civil government, to make new laws, to promote profitable evils, and contemptuously to break existing laws they can not repeal.

The liquor interests have written their own indictment and accumulated the evidence justifying their own extinction. The breweries have been asked for years to cease to promote the disreputable and irresponsible saloon keeper. They have been asked to clean up the vicious resorts that have been a bane and a menace to decent communities. Their reply was a sneer and the statement that it was the brewery's business to make and sell beer. Whisky has been denounced as a dangerous beverage and restraints demanded for more than half a century.

The answer has been opposition or abuse of those who would regulate as well as those who would prohibit. All who have asked that present laws be obeyed have been stigmatized as fanatics, and fresh infractions of regulatory laws have followed every effort for their enforcement. Wine growers have been advised of the evils gathering about their heads. They, too, have been deaf to the developing hostilities of this generation to intoxicating liquor. If they are caught in the whirlpool of an aroused and righteous indignation, they will but suffer the penalty resulting from their indifference or open sympathy with the more culpable of their kind. A business whose system is lawlessness and whose finished product is a drunkard ought to have no lawful abiding place in this Republic. It is an outlaw measured by its practices and a criminal tested by its results. A business that will not be regulated by law must at last be destroyed by law. The traffic in intoxicating liquor has refused to be regulated, and therefore earned the penalty of legislative extinction. Its promises of reformation are to be weighed in the light of its past performances. The breweries' efforts to reform the saloon keeper are to be measured by their creation of his disreputable kind.

From a broken-hearted mother I have a letter on the taking of her only son to be sent across the sea to help free the world from kingcraft and autocracy. Her own father died in our Civil War. She knows what it means. No braver blood ever ran in the veins of the Spartans of old than the ruddy drops that visit her sad heart. She does not fear he may be one of that number whom we know will not return. She knows that a soldier keeps step with death and marches in the shadow of his own headstone. Her appeal is not against the inevitable risks of the hospital and the camp, the perils of the trench and the battle field. She asks only that her own flesh and blood typified in her son be shielded from the insidious but more deadly perils of drunkenness and its kindred evils. She is a God-fearing woman, who believes in the immortality of the soul and the life of which a human grave is but the threshold. She knows that life is but the way we must pass through nature to eternity. She watched him in his cradle. Her hand wrought for him his tiny garments before he was born. She bent above his cradle on winter nights and tucked him in to keep him safe until the dawn. She watched over him as he grew to understanding and now putting off the garments of peace and wearing a soldier's garb, he has passed beyond her hand and eye. She has made the supreme sacrifice that mothers have always offered since man has scourged the earth with his endless wars. For all this she utters none but words of loyalty and hope. From the deadly vices that stain the soul and corrupt the body she asks this Government to protect her son. She belongs to that mighty host of earth's women who wait and suffer and pray in obscurity and silence. While man has fought on the red hillsides where every helmet caught a ray of glory, she has kept her patient vigil unseen of men, unknown to a careless world. Shall not some one give voice to her unspeakable anxiety? Are the rights of property superior to the dumb, inarticulate woe of a nation's motherhood on the eve of its Gethsemane?

Why should not Congress vote to the uttermost limits to give her that guaranty and peace of mind in return for the priceless sacrifice she has made? When our final audit shall come before the Great Searcher of human hearts, I would rather have one broken-hearted mother ask for me justice, tempered with mercy, than all the breweries, the saloons, and the institutions built upon intoxicating liquors this side of the bottomless pit.

Let it be considered by the Senate. Let the rights of property be considered more sacred than the rights of humanity, if you will; but in this great day of struggle let us at once rise to the level where moral sacrifices are made, and where regulation can be made possible by constitutional power that will keep pace with the requirements of a new world after the regeneration of the mighty war in the Old World.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I have here a piece of evidence and an argument, too, that I consider very pertinent in connection with the remarks just made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], especially that part of his remarks first made in regard to the work and the experience of the medical profession. I find this evidence and argument in a short chapter in a book entitled "Alcohol; Its Relation to Human Efficiency and Longevity," written by Eugene Lyman Fisk, medical director of the Life Extension Institute. The chapter I refer to is entitled "Attitude of American medical profession," and it reads as follows:

At the meeting of the American Medical Association held on June 6, 1917, Dr. Charles H. Mayo, the noted surgeon, in his presidential address stated that the only legitimate use for alcohol was in the arts and sciences, and that its use in medicine had become greatly restricted because other less menacing drugs and remedial measures could be used instead. He stated that the advisability of national prohibition as a war measure was beyond discussion, and that the medical profession would welcome national prohibition. These expressions brought enthusiastic response from the assembled physicians, which left no doubt as to their sentiments.

At a later meeting the house of delegates of the American Medical Association passed the following resolution:

"Whereas we believe that the use of alcohol is detrimental to the human economy, and

"Whereas its use in therapeutics as a tonic or stimulent or for food has no scientific value: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the American Medical Association is opposed to the use of alcohol as a beverage; and be it further

"Resolved, That the use of alcohol as a therapeutic agent should be further discouraged."

Entirely apart from moral grounds, the judgment of the majority of scientific men is against even the so-called moderate use of alcohol, and this judgment, long withheld through scientific conservatism, but now unequivocally and boldly stated by the distinguished surgeon who has received the highest mark of confidence that the medical profession can offer, should be accepted by the lawgiver, business man, and patriotic citizen who wishes to best serve his country with his total and maximum efficiency of mind and body.

There, Mr. President, is what I regard as one of the most valuable pieces of evidence we can find in support of the submission of this amendment to the several States of the Union.

Mr. President, the liquor traffic is an evil, and I think we must all admit it, from the economic point of view. Indeed, it is from that point of view that it is now for the most part being considered; but it is an evil from the moral point of view. It is an evil from the political and the social point of view. It is an evil from the physiological, the health, and the medical point of view, as is conclusively shown by the chapter I have just read, giving the resolutions enacted by the American Medical Association and the opinion of Dr. Mayo.

The argument is made, Mr. President, that it will be against the will of individual States, and that if it were submitted to a vote in several States of the Union they would vote against prohibition. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] a while ago stated what he believed to be the sentiment in his State and that it was opposed now to prohibition. That sentiment may vote against this amendment, Mr. President; and yet it must be remembered that even in those States whose legislatures would vote against the amendment, were it submitted now, there is a great body of progressive, patriotic, dependable citizens who would, if permitted, vote for State-wide prohibition in their respective States; who would, if they could be permitted, vote for this amendment to the National Constitution; and I have the confidence to believe that the votes of this class of people, combined with the prohibition vote in prohibition States, would in the aggregate give throughout the Union a majority in favor of national prohibition.

Again, Mr. President, those who oppose the joint resolution and the submission of this amendment to the people do not take account of the rapid growth of public sentiment. States which to-day are opposed may a year hence or two years hence, or before the legislatures meet to act upon this amendment, be in favor of prohibition, so rapid is the change of sentiment likely to be. Hence the amendment, though it should be adopted against the present will of a majority in certain States of the Union, may a year hence be quite in accord with the majority sentiment in those States. I think those who oppose this resolution should take an account of the fact that the movement for prohibition is, as it were, a great national movement, and that several States now opposed to the proposed amendment will in all likelihood be in favor of it within a comparatively short time.

Mr. President, it has been said by one great writer and critic of our institutions, still living, and one whom I think sympathizes with and appreciates them as no other foreign critic has done, that the United States disclose a type of institutions, one growing out of the principle of the rule of the multitude, toward which all the rest of civilized mankind have been forced to move as by a law of fate, some with swifter, other with slower, but all with unresting feet. A splendid thing it will be if to the United States of America, this great Republic of the west, toward which other people have looked as an example of free institutions, they can also look as an example on this great economic and moral question involving as it does the sobriety, efficiency, the happiness of many millions—an example toward which they, whatever their practices and traditions are, may move, "some, indeed, with swifter, others with slower, but all with unresting feet."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I hope the amendment of the Senator from Georgia will be voted down. It is not necessary to the accomplishment of the purposes of the resolution. We should employ in the organic law as few terms as possible in order to reach the purpose we have in mind.

The amendment now framed prohibits the manufacture of intoxicating liquors within the limits of the Republic and the importation of such liquors into the Republic. It destroys the traffic in intoxicating liquors. With that object accomplished, use will cease and purchase will cease, and therefore it is unnecessary to have specific provisions as to purchase and use embodied in the amendment. I trust that the amendment of the Senator from Georgia will be rejected.

Mr. HARDWICK. Does the Senator state any specific objection to my amendment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I say it is unnecessary, and I do not want to put any unnecessary language in the constitutional amendment.

Mr. KIRBY. Mr. President, I am glad to stand in this presence to-day and confirm the great truth as expressed by the poet:

> Yet I doubt not through the ages one increasing purpose runs,
> And the thoughts of men are widen'd with the process of the suns.

I believe this proposal shows a distinct advance in the development of the civilization of our time. This is but another phase of the world-old battle of right against wrong, another phase of that everlasting conflict between the forces which conduce to uplift and upbuild the race against those which tend to tear down and destroy it.

To-day I am glad that I can add my voice in support of this resolution, leaving to the people of the States of this greatest of all nations to say whether we shall longer be inflicted with the open saloon and the liquor traffic, from which we have suffered so terribly in times past, with its innumerable difficulties and obstructions thrown in the way of our progress.

Mr. President, the saloon and the liquor traffic have been convicted at the bar of public opinion of being an enemy to mankind, to the individual, to the family, to the home, the community, the State, the Nation, and the race; and this is but an effort to-day in self-defense, and I am glad to support it.

We must play the game according to the rules. I have but little patience with those Senators who insist that the people of the State of Arkansas, because it does not have as much population as the State of New York, are not entitled to as great weight in the adoption of this resolution into the national Constitution as other States. The people when we established the Union said that this Constitution must be amended in a particular way, and prescribed the rules therefor, and according to those rules this matter must and ought to be determined.

We have not to go outside of the rules as already prescribed, and we do not expect that others than the friends of this sort of legislation shall have amendments tacked onto it to its injury, as would be the effect of the one proposed by the Senator from Georgia. We believe it is better to submit it as it has been offered here, and I believe the people of the States will ratify it within less than six years, the time proposed.

All of us understand what the liquor traffic means. All of us understand its past. All of us understand that it has been the corrupter of honesty and a destroyer of virtue and a murderer of happiness throughout this whole land. There is no excuse for its longer continuance now, and there never was any substantial reason for its inexcusable reign.

I have long thought this way about the question, so far as I am individually concerned, and I believe that the time has come when the people of this Nation have come to that conclusion. I am anxious that they shall have an opportunity to express that conclusion if they have already formed it in their minds, as I believe they have done.

There can be no objection certainly to submitting it as all other amendments to the Constitution have been submitted, and there can be no objection, so far as I am concerned, in having it submitted in the language that its friends think ought to be used in its submission and that will tend most strongly to secure its adoption when it shall come to the time for adoption by the different States.

I have not heard one single objection here that I regard a valid or substantial objection to the submission of the amendment at this time to the people of the United States; and I believe when it shall have been submitted and when it shall have been adopted we will wake up as we proceed with the different avocations and along the usual lines of employment, building up our Nation and improving it hereafter, we will look back upon the past as a hideous nightmare, when this traffic was permitted throughout the United States by intelligent men and submitted to by women because, forsooth, they had no voice to prevent it.

As you all know, the great God omniscient, who has seen the rise and fall of all the nations of the past, the rise and fall of all the nations that are now, and the rise and fall of all nations that shall ever be, He did not say that the thundering tread of marching millions, He did not say that proud riding navies heavily armored with long-distance guns, He did not say that all the wealth of the world stored up, but that "righteousness"—simple righteousness—"exalteth a nation." I believe that that righteousness has been inculcated into the minds and lives of the people, and that it has been accentuated to such an extent by the contrast with this awful curse that has afflicted the people, from which they have suffered grievously so long, that it has been so impressed that this amendment will be adopted; and when it has been adopted, then indeed may we all say that the Nation has truly been exalted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to insert the words "purchase, use" after the word "sale."

Mr. HARDWICK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PAGE (when Mr. DILLINGHAM's name was called). I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. He has a pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. I should like to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who is absent, but under the terms of the pair I am at liberty to vote. I shall therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is absent from the city. Not being able to obtain a transfer of my pair, in the absence of the Senator from Connecticut I withhold my vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH (when Mr. THOMAS's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS]. I will state that he is paired with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. My colleague is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] on account of sickness. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. He being absent, I am compelled to refrain from voting.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] who is absent. I understand that if present he would vote as I do. I vote "nay."

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] and also the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HUSTING] on important business.

Mr. BECKHAM. Has the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. BECKHAM. I have a general pair with that Senator. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has not voted. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and let my vote stand.

Mr. STERLING (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

So Mr. HARDWICK's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HARDING. I desire to call up the amendment I proposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The SECRETARY. Insert a new section to be known as section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, on or before the 1st day of July, A. D. 1923.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I have offered the amendment as representing the judgment of a number of Senators on the floor, with a view to placing a limitation on the pendency of the proposed amendment to the Constitution. I do it because that policy is involved in my consent to support the pending resolution.

I am so very much in earnest about it, Mr. President, that if I could have my way, if it were possible to get this body to consent to such an amendment, I would insist on limiting it to one vote or expression on the part of each State legislature. That would be a rather drastic procedure.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I can not hear at this distance a word that the Senator from Ohio is saying.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio will suspend. Order must be maintained in the Chamber. The Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. HARDING. The thought I have in mind, Mr. President, is the elimination of this unending prohibition contest in the Halls of Congress. At the same time, I am in sympathy with the opposition to the resolution about the unfairness of adopting a Federal amendment under the provisions of the Constitution on a question relating to personal liberty, and if there were any other method of submitting an amendment I should be very glad to employ it.

I am not a prohibitionist, Mr. President, and never have pretended to be. I do claim to be a temperance man. I do not approach this question from a moral viewpoint, because I am unable to see it as a great moral question. I can remember very distinctly, when I was a boy, during the early days of a hardy rural citizenship in Ohio some of the most moral people the State boasted had a jug of whisky in the fence corner during the harvest time. I am not saying that I favor that. I only cite it as an instance that it is not always and invariably a moral question.

But I do see the ethical and economical side of it, and when it comes to a decision on this point, at a time when we are boasting of our warfare for popular government, I can not be inconsistent enough to deny the settlement of this much-mooted question by popular will in the only manner in which the Constitution provides.

I do think it is unwise, imprudent, and inconsiderate to force the issue at this time. I do not question the sincerity or the high purpose of the prohibition forces, but I do believe, and very sincerely, that it is a great imposition on Congress and a great misfortune to the country to divide American citizenship into two hostile camps over this question of personal liberty at a time when we ought to be promoting the concord of citizenship that is essential to win this war. But having expressed myself as regretting the pressure brought to settle this issue now, I must go further and say that since it is insistent and intruding, so that we must reach a decision now, I find myself impelled to take the side which I think must in the end contribute to the most good of our common people.

I do not think a prohibition amendment will be effective, Mr. President. You can not make any law stronger than the public sentiment which sees to its enforcement. I have watched the progress of this question from the conflict in the hamlet to the municipality, to the county, the State, and the Nation, and while I stand here and freely express my doubts about its practicability, at the same time I recognize that it is growing and insistent and persistent and it must be settled.

Ever since I have been in public life in a small way I have seen men continually measured by the wet and dry yardstick, and the submission of this amendment is going to measure every candidate for public office by the wet and dry yardstick until the final settlement. When I say that, I have expressed my strongest reason for putting a limitation upon the pendency of the amendment. I want to see this question settled. I want to take it out of the Halls of Congress and refer it to the people who must make the ultimate decision. I want to meet the demand for submission, and witness a decision.

So then, in spite of its untimeliness, in spite of the lack of prudence in submitting it now, since we have come to this question of prohibition as a war measure, and there has been a yielding on the one hand against drastic prohibition in the food bill, I think this submission is a sort of a compromise between the contending forces, and I am willing to be counted a compromising agent. All our great movements are the result of just such endeavors. I do not hesitate to say that I approach the question from a strong sense of justice, and if this amendment is submitted to the people of the United States and receives the sanction of three-fourths of the general assemblies, then, if my tenure of office still obtains, I am willing to go further and join in a movement to make it effective through a process of compensation to the business destroyed.

So then, Mr. President, in these rather rambling remarks which I have made, rather than turning to some written ones I wished to offer, I will say that I should like to see this amendment adopted, because it accomplishes one great thing: It forces this great public question to a final settlement within the period of six years. We shall have the question acutely presented until it has been finally disposed of within that time. I am sure that after we have disposed of it, we shall find national legislative and State legislative duties adjusted to much more normal lines.

I hope that the judgment of the Senate will be such that it will agree to this limitation amendment. I know there are arguments against the constitutionality of such a course, but there can be no argument offered that will question the validity of the amendment if it is adopted within the time prescribed.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I suggest an amendment to the amendment by changing the number of the section from 2 to 3, as we already have two sections of the joint resolution; and also by striking out the words "on or before the 1st day of July, anno Domini 1923," and inserting "within six years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress." That will insure the period of six years for consideration. If the other House should not vote on this proposition, and it should not be submitted for eight or ten months to come, there would not then be six years remaining for the ratification of the proposed amendment.

Mr. LODGE. I did not quite hear the limitation of time. Will the Senator from Texas kindly repeat it?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The language I propose to substitute is "within six years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress."

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, as to the latter part of the amendment of the Senator from Texas to my amendment I am quite agreed, because that is the spirit of my amendment. I think it would be more prudent, however, to let the amendment stand as section 2 and let it be followed by what is now section 2 of the joint resolution to be numbered 3.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is acceptable.

Mr. HARDING. Then, Mr. President, I am very glad to accept the suggestion of the Senator from Texas to modify the time limit so that the language shall read "within six years from the date of its submission by the Congress," if that be the language which the Senator proposes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The exact language is "within six years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress."

Mr. HARDING. That is quite agreeable.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I withdraw the part of the amendment to the amendment which I have offered relating to the number of the section. After we vote on the proposition I will submit an amendment to change the number of section 2 so that it will be section 3, or the Secretary may make the necessary change by unanimous consent.

Mr. HARDING. That is entirely agreeable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio accepts the suggestion of the Senator from Texas. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio, as modified, is the question before the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have very grave doubts about whether or not this can be done. If this proposed constitutional amendment goes to the States at the present time, as the Constitution of the United States now stands the States have a right to ratify it within any time they may see fit. The number of years within which they may take action is not limited. If it is submitted to the States, the Constitution of the United States will stand with reference to amendments at the time the ratification is going on just as it now is; there will be no change in the machinery which the Constitution provides for ratification; and when the States vote upon this question they will be voting on it under the Constitution of the United States as it now exists. We having submitted it to the States, it is in the possession of the States, and we can not control it. They have a perfect right to say, "We shall ratify this now" or "We will ratify it in 10 years from now," and when they shall ratify it they will have acted in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. I have not any doubt about that at all.

I would vote for an amendment to change the Constitution of the United States in regard to the machinery provided for the ratification of proposed amendments, because I think there is much merit in the proposition that there ought to be a time within which constitutional amendments should be ratified; but we can not change the Constitution of the United States as to the machinery by which ratification takes place by the manner in which we submit a particular constitutional amendment. In other words, we can not provide in the submission a rule for ratification of that particular proposal when there is another existing rule in the Constitution.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. Does the Senator from Idaho know of any inhibition in the Constitution that prevents putting in this condition?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I have just called attention to it. As the Constitution now exists, there is no limitation upon the time within which the States may ratify an amendment. The time therein provided is "when ratified," and by that rule this amendment is controlled. Now, if this amendment goes to the States, suppose that at the end of six years within two of the requisite number of States have ratified the amendment; suppose after six years and within eight years two more ratify it, will they not inevitably say "We have ratified it in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution as it now stands"? How are you going to prevent the amendment from taking effect? They can point to the fact that here is the Constitution under which we are acting; it has not been changed; the Congress of the United States can not hold a tether on an amendment and pull it back after it is once submitted even though it is not seen fit by the States to ratify it within a certain time. When we submit it, it goes to the States and they act under the provision of the Constitution which fixes no limit of time. They do not act under a rule which the Congress fixes in the proposal submitted, but under the rule found in the Constitution. Under our Constitution the proposal can not carry its own rule of ratification because the Constitution fixes the rule.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. STONE. I wish to ask a question of the Senator. The Senator says that he would vote for an amendment to the Constitution fixing a time limit for the adoption of amendments to the Constitution; in other words, he would be willing to incorporate that idea into the body of the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. STONE. Very well. Now, if we could submit, which we could do, an amendment to the Constitution providing that all amendments to that instrument thereafter submitted should be adopted within a fixed time limit, can not the Congress, following the same idea, exercising the same privilege, provide, in submitting a given amendment, that it shall be adopted within a given time?

Mr. BORAH. I can convince the Senator in a minute I think that the two propositions are as wide apart as day and night as questions of constitutional law. If we submit a general amendment to the Constitution of the United States changing the machinery and fixing a limit of time, that goes to the States and when ratified becomes a part of the Constitution of the United States; but when we submit this time-limit amendment to the States it is not a part of the Constitution.

Mr. HARDING. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I shall do so in just a moment. The States are proceeding all the time to ratify the amendment under a Constitution which exists and is unchanged. The one instance is a case where the Constitution is changed; the other instance is where we submit an amendment to the Constitution as to which we propose to have a rule with reference to its ratification other than that which exists in the Constitution.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has read Article V of the Constitution, and that article of the Constitution itself gives an example of explicit limitation by providing that there shall be no amendment prior to 1808.

Mr. BORAH. But that was a part of the Constitution.

Mr. HARDING. Exactly so; and it does not put any inhibition on Congress expressing a condition as part of an amendment.

Mr. BORAH. But let me ask the Senator this question: If this proposed amendment should go to the States now and they should proceed to ratify it, they would be ratifying it under the Constitution as it now exists, and it would be ratified under the Constitution as it now exists clear on through until they shall have finished their work.

Mr. HARDING. Supplemented by——

Mr. BORAH. Wait a moment. Suppose that at the end of six years only 31 States have ratified the amendment. Certainly the time-limit provision has not become a part of the constitutional change proposed, because the amendment has never been ratified; and yet Congress holds a tether upon it and draws it back, notwithstanding the States have a right to say, "This has been submitted to us under the Constitution as it exists and we are entitled to go ahead."

Mr. HARDING. I think the Senator is wrong, because Congress, in its exercise of power in submitting the amendment to the Constitution, specifically says, "If you do not exercise your right to ratify it within six years, then this amendment is withdrawn."

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but the States in answer to that say, "Congress can not do that, because the fundamental law of the land says we do not have to ratify it in six years from now. You have submitted it to us and we may ratify it in eight years."

Mr. LODGE. The fundamental law of the land does not say anything about it.

Mr. BORAH. I beg the Senator's pardon. The fundamental law of the land does say very plainly, that it places no limitation upon the time when or within which it must be ratified. It says, "when ratified," and fixes no limit.

Mr. LODGE. It says nothing about it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I am always glad to find myself in accord with the Senator from Idaho on legal propositions, but I confess I must differ from him on this. The Constitution itself authorizes the submission of amendments to the Constitution by a joint resolution passed by a two-thirds vote of Congress. There is no limitation attached to that. This Congress can submit any amendment that it sees fit, and, in my judgment, with any limitations or conditions attached to it.

Mr. BORAH. That is where I differ from the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I know we differ in that respect. If there were no limitation placed upon this proposed amendment as to the time within which it must be ratified, then, perhaps, by a different amendment at another time we might not be able to accomplish that end; but we submit here, as a part of this proposition which goes to the organic law, the further statement that this is inoperative unless it is ratified within a given time. That is a part of the proposition, in my judgment.

Mr. BORAH. But here, Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. Suppose that this amendment were submitted to the States just as the joint resolution is written, with section 2 in it, and at the end of six years 31 States had ratified it, certainly it would not be a part of the Constitution, would it?

Mr. POMERENE. How many States did the Senator suggest?

Mr. BORAH. Thirty-one States.

Mr. POMERENE. No; it would not be a part of the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. It would not be a part of the Constitution. It never could be a part of the Constitution under any circumstances until 36 States had ratified it.

Mr. POMERENE. That is true.

Mr. BORAH. And if 36 States had ratified it in 10 years, they could reply to this proposition, "We proceeded under the Constitution as it existed."

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; but it seems to me that the Senator overlooks the fact, if the so-called Sheppard amendment is adopted, that is one thing——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Idaho has expired.

Mr. POMERENE. But it is proposed to amend——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio desire recognition?

Mr. POMERENE. I will ask the attention of the Senate for just a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. But if the amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. HARDING] is agreed upon by the Senate, we are not proposing to submit the simple proposition of the Senator from Texas, but the amendment of my colleague becomes an integral part of the constitutional amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. BORAH. After it has been ratified by the States, then, of course, this particular amendment becomes a part of the Constitution; but the States can proceed to vote after the end of six years, for the reason that as yet the Constitution has not been changed.

Mr. POMERENE. But, Mr. President, the amendment of the junior Senator from Ohio, if adopted, becomes an integral part of the resolution. It becomes as much a part of the resolution itself as the original resolution presented by the Senator from Texas, in my judgment; and I know of nothing in the Constitution which says that the Congress can not attach any condition or qualification to a proposition which it submits in the form of a proposed amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator again only to say that the friends of this movement will find in after years that they have been led into a cul-de-sac. I do not challenge men's motives, but that is the effect and that will be the result.

Mr. POMERENE. I am not prognosticating as to what may happen later. I was addressing myself solely to the legal proposition, and I feel quite as convinced I am right as my learned friend from Idaho does that he is right.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I would favor the submission of a separate constitutional amendment providing that all proposed constitutional amendments which have not secured the favorable action of three-quarters of the legislatures of the States in a definite period of years shall fail; but I agree entirely with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in the view which he takes of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING].

I intend to vote against the proposed constitutional amendment, but it is not with any relation to that that I say what I am about to say. In my opinion the attachment of this time-limit amendment to the proposed prohibition constitutional amendment is extremely liable to result in the loss of the amendment, and if I wanted by more or less of a trick to secure the defeat of the amendment I would want no better opportunity to embarrass this proposed constitutional amendment than to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Article V of the Constitution, providing how amendments shall be submitted to the States for the approval of their legislatures or State conventions, says that amendments—> shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States.

The Constitution itself, therefore, provides that an amendment shall be ratified when approved by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States; and I think there is no question that that word "when" always has been interpreted, and is correctly interpreted, as though it were "whenever." That has been the practice of the States in connection with all constitutional amendments which have been adopted.

Suppose the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is added to the joint resolution. I can readily see that when the matter is taken to the Supreme Court the Supreme Court may hold that Congress, by attempting to prescribe an unconstitutional condition to the machinery by which the amendment must be approved by the legislatures of the States, has exceeded its authority, and the whole amendment may fail, although ratified by the States in eight years. For instance, suppose six years go by and three-fourths of the States have not acted favorably upon this proposed constitutional amendment, but that at the end of eight years three-quarters of the States have acted favorably upon it; the friends of this amendment, of course, I suppose, would then, in order to secure the amendment, have to turn around and claim that Congress had no authority to attach a time limit to it, and that it had become a part of the Constitution.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. THOMPSON. Would not the Senator think, if his view of the constitutional power is correct, that it would only invalidate this particular section and not the entire resolution?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the amendment of the Senator from Ohio only invalidated itself, no harm would be done, of course; but if the court should hold that it was, in the language of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], such an integral part of the amendment as that it could not be dissected from the body of the amendment, then the risk would be run of having the whole amendment defeated.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. HARDING. Suppose there is no limit placed upon the pendency of the amendment, and suppose the State of Ohio votes to adopt the amendment, we will say, in 1919, and then in 1921 reverses that decision and seeks to withdraw its approval, what happens?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am informed, Mr. President, although I have not looked the cases up, that the courts have held that a legislature may reject an amendment and then at another session may adopt it, and such action will enable that State to be counted as one of the three-quarters necessary to approve the amendment. On the other hand, if a legislature adopts an amendment, it can not then at another session or at the same session reject it and have its action count against the amendment. In other words, a time watch is set, and whenever it strikes a certain way that concludes the matter, while if it strikes the other way it is still open to further action, because, under the language of Article V of the Constitution, it becomes valid when approved, irrespective of how many times it has been disapproved before that.

Mr. HARDING. Then, I want to ask the Senator, suppose a State—we will say Massachusetts, for example, with its annual elections—has rejected this amendment six successive times, does the Senator think it ought to be still left open for the seventh to adopt it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think it ought to be; and if the Senator from Ohio, with whose intent I thoroughly agree, and his friends would now prepare another proposed constitutional amendment providing that all constitutional amendments to be submitted to the States shall be approved within six years or eight years—whatever time limit may be desired—and that those not approved within that time shall be deemed to have failed, I would vote for it. If such an amendment were passed now by a two-thirds vote in both branches, and the States voted on and ratified it first, then the Constitution would be amended, and the amendment would be applicable to the pending prohibition amendment; but it is utterly beyond my mental apparatus to comprehend the claim that, with the Constitution as at present written, with its existing machinery for its own amendment, a proposed amendment which it is sought to make a part of the Constitution can include a provision which will so change the Constitution as to make it applicable to the very amendment which itself can not take effect until it has been ratified by three-quarters of the States. It is an attempt to hoist yourself by your own boot straps, if I may use a homely phrase.

The Constitution stands as it is until amended, and yet it is proposed to attach an amendment to a proposed constitutional amendment changing the existing constitutional machinery so that it will operate under a proposed amendment, which is no amendment until it also has been adopted, at the same time the attempt is made to adopt the condition.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield further to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. Does the Senator believe if this amendment were ratified by the States within six years, that there would be any question of its validity?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think there would be a serious question of its validity, because it would not have been submitted in a constitutional manner. Whether it would be contested or not is a different proposition, but the effect of this amendment will be to destroy large amounts of property which the courts have declared to be entitled to the protection of the Constitution, and it can not be taken or destroyed, by the General Government at least, no matter what may be done by a separate State under its police power, in an arbitrary manner. All sorts of legal questions I apprehend, will be raised by the owners of this property and by those engaged in the liquor business to prevent the destruction of their rights, and it would seem to me that it would be well for Congress to consider before it leaps.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. If we can submit in this proposal a proposition to limit the time within which the States may ratify it, could we not with equal force submit a proposition that when a majority of the States ratify this amendment it shall be an amendment to the Constitution?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes, Mr. President, we could with equal power and authority, in my opinion, attempt to say that the amendment shall take effect and become a part of the Constitution to all intents and purposes when ratified by a majority of the electors of the several States, which is what ought to be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, if the experience of other Senators upon this floor has been at all similar to mine they will have realized that there is a complete misunderstanding and misconception of what to-day the United States Senate is doing upon this particular proposition. From the hysterical telegrams that have come to me upon both sides of the issue the people of the State which I in part represent apparently are laboring under the delusion that we are affirmatively enacting now a prohibition measure which at once will go into effect and which at once will render this Nation dry. This is such a total misconception and misunderstanding that I think, from our standpoint in the far West at least, it ought to be made plain that to-day in presenting and proposing a constitutional amendment we are but following our conception of the fundamental principle of popular rule—popular rule, which has been with us not a mere empty phrase, but which has been a basic governmental idea written in our State into our constitution. We are, Mr. President, but following this idea and this principle of popular rule in enabling the people of the Nation, when a considerable number ask that privilege, to pass upon an important matter of national legislation.

We do not to-day, of course, enact a prohibitory law; indeed we do not even to-day express an opinion upon a national prohibitory law; but under the resolution that is presented and under that which we here understand, all we do in the language of the resolution is to propose "to the States an amendment to the Constitution to be acted upon and to be ratified by the various States of the Union if they shall see fit."

In the territory from which I come the question of the right of the people to pass upon any given matter has become fundamental and vital. In 1911, when our political revolution occurred in the State of California, all of us with feverish anxiety turned in every direction to ascertain how we could place in the hands of the people just liberated from a quarter of a century of corporate rule the weapon by which they might maintain that freedom so hardly and with such difficulty won. Then, when we turned to find the weapon we found it only by enabling our people, whenever they sought to pass upon any legislation, to have the right to pass upon it whenever they desired; to halt recalcitrant representatives and themselves pass upon their acts. What I do to-day in regard to this particular amendment is only following that rule, that particular fundamental principle, the right of our people to govern themselves by submitting to them a proposed constitutional amendment in the only manner that is accorded to us under our organic law, and by letting them, and them alone, determine whether or not that which a very large number of our people desire shall become a part of the Constitution of the United States.

I would, indeed, submit any question by constitutional amendment where there was a really considerable number of our people who desired its submission. I expect within the next 24 or 48 hours to ask the chairman of the Committee on Woman Suffrage why it is that a particular resolution that has been concurred in by every member of that committee is not presented to the Senate of the United States, and by the Senate of the United States presented to the Nation for the Nation's action and for the Nation's determination of equal suffrage in this land. If there be any other question, economic, ethical, or moral, that any really great number of our people wish submitted to the electorate or to the States, I would vote to submit that particular question, no matter what my individual view might be.

Turning now from the particular subject thus discussed to the amendment presented by the Senator from Ohio [Mr HARDING], I want to say that I am in thorough accord with the views expressed by that Senator and those expressed by his colleague in reference to its legality. This particular amendment, with its limitation of six years, is not an abrogation of the Constitution of the United States. It is not an effort to amend that Constitution or in any way to alter any substantive part of it.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio is a limitation and a condition imposed upon the particular constitutional amendment, and it is just as legal and just as valid that that sort of limitation and that kind of condition should be imposed upon the proposed constitutional amendment as it would be if we wrote after the words "manufacture, sale, or transportation," a particular time limit within which the manufacture, sale, or transportation might be permitted within our particular territory.

I feel that the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]—for whom I have the most profound respect, and who, as a constitutional expounder, stands second to none in all this land—is in error when he insists that we are amending the Constitution of the United States by this particular limitation and this specific condition. We are not amending the Constitution. We are simply imposing that limitation and that condition upon the specific amendment, and the specific amendment alone.

So I trust that the particular amendment may be passed, and I shall cast my vote for the joint resolution that is presented by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] upon the ground and upon the theory—fundamental with us of the West, upon the very basic idea upon which we have builded new Commonwealths there—that the people finally have the right to pass upon any question where any considerable number of the people ask that right.

During the discussion upon the Resolution (S. J. Res. 17) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, Senator FRANCIS E. WARREN, of Wyoming, said:

Mr. President, I have been detained on public duty at another place during most of the time this matter has been up for discussion; but, judging from what has occurred during the brief periods I have been on the floor, I believe it has been very thoroughly discussed.

Time does not permit nor does inclination impel me to make any extended remarks upon the resolution now about to be voted upon by the Senate. Argument for or against the measure at this stage of its procedure, on my part, would be futile, and therefore I shall not attempt to make even the briefest form of one. It has been proclaimed that there are votes enough and to spare to carry it. My only purpose in rising is to state my own position, and that, to some extent, of my State.

I can not give my support to the joint resolution, because I believe, and I think my State believes the same way, that the police powers should be provided by State legislation and rest with the people rather than that the United States should usurp those powers.

It has been and is my belief that each State should have unrestricted control of its police powers, and I think the Supreme Court of the United States has held in various decisions that the police powers of a State within its own borders are paramount and can not be lawfully interfered with even by the Federal Government. In fact, in a somewhat celebrated case—United States against John Racehorse—in which the police powers of the State of Wyoming came in conflict with certain rights granted by a United States treaty to certain Indians, the Supreme Court decided that the police powers of the State were paramount and superseded even treaty-made rights coming in conflict with them. The Supreme Court decided that the State should have unrestricted control of all these matters within her lines.

I gave my support in the war bill to a measure of temperance and which provided that the men of the United States Army should not be surrounded with immorality. I gave my support in the food bill to the so-called food conservation along lines of temperance, but what was really very much of a prohibition bill. But beyond that I do not feel that I can go at this time.

The State of Wyoming has provided, through its legislature, that its people shall vote next year upon an amendment to the State constitution covering this subject. The State of Wyoming, which I in part represent, was, like other new and frontier States, called "wild and woolly," and it was "wide open" in its early career, with "wide-open" towns. One of them, and the one of which I am now pleased and proud to call myself a citizen, was said by some disrespectful critics to be the wickedest city in the world. We commenced from that standard to develop along lines of industry, temperance, and good morals. We first gave the right of suffrage to women and men alike, but we required all who might enjoy suffrage to have sufficient education to read and write. We limited, from time to time, the sale and use of intoxicating beverages until we have to-day simply those few places, in the cities where there is a sufficient police force, that the city governments may permit, limited in number, and a very large license charged against them, and under very close supervision. The State stands second to none in this country in morality and progress along the lines of character and intellectual growth.

In dealing with the liquor question, Wyoming has been practical but not radical. As I have said, the earlier Territorial days of unrestricted use and sale of liquors gave way to the restrictions of high license and later to prohibition outside of incorporated cities and towns. Regulation brought beneficial results, and cities and towns once wide open—"wild and woolly"—became as peaceful and sedate as New England villages of the days of the Puritans.

The State of Wyoming stands only second or third from the top of the list in the per capita amount of money she gave to the Red Cross in its late canvass. She went far beyond her proportion in subscribing to the liberty loan. She furnished more than her quota of troops in the State, one-third of her counties, or 7 of the 21, not being called upon to furnish any troops through draft and having a surplus to their credit. It seems to me that in a State that has provided for her own government and has made the good progress that Wyoming has, it is enough to ask of her that she abide by the decision of her legislature—and the vote was unanimous, or nearly so; there was no party division—and let the State settle what she shall do along the lines of intoxicating beverages.

If the States, as is said to be the case, are falling in line one after another, we have only to wait a short time until the matter will take care of itself without the United States Government entering with its strong hand. If that is the case, we do not need to have the proposed constitutional amendment. If, on the other hand, there are enough States who do not believe the time has arrived, then of course it is useless.

Control of the liquor traffic is essentially a police power vested in the individual States. We of Wyoming think we know how to exercise that power so as to conform to the wishes of our own people. We do not assume to have the knowledge of conditions and views in, say, the State of Texas to the extent that we should frame the laws of that State in regard to the liquor or any other business which is carried on within its jurisdiction. At the same time we do not concede that the people of Texas know us well enough to make our Wyoming laws.

And yet in this resolution that is what is proposed—a certain number of States can inject the views and beliefs of their citizens into the laws and regulations of other States.

I prefer to have Wyoming make its own laws for the regulation of the liquor traffic within its boundaries. I believe the people of my State are qualified to do this; I believe they will do it, and do it in the sensible, practical way they have carried on other reforms—with a due sense of proportion and the observance of the rights and equities of all.

Therefore upon this resolution I shall vote to permit Wyoming and each of the other States of the Union to continue to make its own laws for the regulation of the liquor business within its own jurisdiction.

I have believed, and I believe now, that progress can be truly made faster where we go just fast enough in these lines of reform so that our laws are obeyed and administered actively and completely. There are States in the Union that are ostensibly "bone dry" that put to shame, through the use of liquors and through intoxication, some of the States that are under license.

Mr. President, I shall not take further time; but I simply say that I shall be found among perhaps the few that will vote "no" on the proposed constitutional amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer the matter which I send to the desk as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Iowa.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed, which when duly ratified by three-fourths of the several States shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of said Constitution, to wit:

Amend Article V of the said Constitution by adding thereto the following, to wit:

"Provided, That all amendments to the Constitution so proposed and submitted to the States for ratification after January 1, 1917, in order to become valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution, shall be so ratified within a period of eight years after such submission: And provided further, That the action of any State ratifying an amendment must be without modification or condition and shall not be subject to recision or recall in any form whatsoever."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am very much opposed to the amendment suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. It is not only an exercise of authority which has not been granted to us by the Constitution, but it is exceedingly unfair and unjust. The amendment which I have proposed is a further proposal of an amendment to the Constitution, and would, if adopted, be voted upon by the States as a separate amendment to that instrument.

I am in favor of supplying what is manifestly a defect in our Constitution and providing some limit of time within which amendments to the instrument must be ratified, but I am earnestly opposed to the attempt to attach to the joint resolution offered by the Senator from Texas a condition which is not only unfair in itself, but is unauthorized by the organic law.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is entirely right, from my standpoint. We are empowered in the Constitution to do what? To propose amendments to that instrument. We have no other authority. From what part of the Constitution do we get the power to attach a condition to an amendment which we submit to the States for ratification? Our authority is exhausted when we declare that an amendment shall be proposed to the States.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio does not amend the Constitution. It does not pretend to amend the Constitution. It is simply an effort, if passed, upon the part of the Senate to qualify the power which we are attempting to exercise, namely, to propose an amendment to the Constitution.

I have no doubt whatever that if ratifications were to occur after the period of six years named in the amendment of the Senator from Ohio the courts would either recognize those ratifications or set aside the entire amendment, and the possible outcome of adopting the amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be to plunge the whole subject into litigation that may continue for years to come. I for one am not willing to embarrass the cause of prohibition by any such unwarranted exercise of power.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHIELDS. I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator along the line of his argument, in which I am very much interested. I will say to him that I have not thought a great deal upon the subject so far, and I wish his opinion upon this view of it. I understand the Senator from Iowa to take the position that the Congress has not the power to limit in any way the action of the States in adopting an amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that position. I say that the only way in which we can limit the time within which a proposed amendment shall be acted upon is by a definite and substantive amendment to the Constitution.

Mr. SHIELDS. I correctly understood the Senator, then. I call the attention of the Senator to this principle, and ask his views of it:

Wherever there is a grant of power, it carries with it the grant of a lesser degree of the full extent of the power granted. I will illustrate my proposition, if the Senator will bear with me, and then I will ask the Senator to express his views.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator will remember that I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. SHIELDS. The pardoning power is given the Executive by the Constitution of the United States. It is an absolute grant of that power; but under that grant the courts have always held that the lesser being embraced in the greater, the Executive may commute a sentence; he may grant a conditional pardon. Now, is not this an absolute power for the Congress to submit to the States the proposed amendment to be ratified? Can it not be coupled with a condition or a limitation, and come within the principle that the greater involves the lesser?

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Chair how much time I have left?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has one minute remaining.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Tennessee has taken up so much of my time that I could not pretend to answer his question within that minute.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I did not fully understand the Senator's reply, and I shall be glad to yield to him in my time to answer the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Tennessee will be kind enough to do that, I reply that the rule to which he refers can have no application in a constitutional grant of power to Congress upon a subject like this. There is no lesser degree of power. Our power is to propose an amendment to the Constitution. It is complete in itself and there are no gradations of that power, and, as it appeals to me, there could not be. The two Houses of Congress are the instrumentalities chosen by the Constitution to submit to the States proposed changes in our organic law. That is the power given to us. If we do not want to exercise that power, we of course can decline it; but if we exercise it, it is not susceptible, from my point of view, of a division. The very moment we attempt to divide it we ourselves are attempting to amend the Constitution, an authority which of course is not claimed by anyone for Congress. I must therefore adhere to my view that so much of the resolution, if it were amended as proposed by the Senator from Ohio, as limits the time, would be entirely ineffectual and could give rise to nothing but embarrassment, delay, litigation, and confusion.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator further to express his views upon this phase of the matter: What objection is there to further amending the Constitution by providing that the amendment shall be ratified within a limited time, as here proposed?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have offered as a substitute a definite amendment to the Constitution, limiting the time in which all amendments may be ratified. If the States under the Constitution as it is shall adopt that amendment, then it is manifest that any other amendment which is not ratified within the period of eight years, as I have made the period, could not become a part of the Constitution.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senator's views as to why both propositions can not be embraced in the same amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. My objection to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is that we are attempting to exercise an authority that we do not possess, and that if it is adopted it can lead to nothing but trouble for those who believe in national prohibition. I can easily understand why those who are opposed to prohibition should desire the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. No matter what the motive may be in offering it, the effect must be, if it has any, the delay, the possible defeat, of national prohibition.

Mr. SHIELDS. Now, Mr. President, following what the Senator from Iowa has stated in expressing his views, I desire to ask him whether there is any limitation whatever in the Constitution of the nature or character of the amendment that may be submitted to be ratified, except that in regard to the representation of the several States in this body?

Mr. CUMMINS. There are but two limitations—one, as the Senator will remember, forbidding amendments on a certain subject up to a certain time; the other forbidding all amendment unless agreed to by all of the States. There are no other limitations.

Mr. SHIELDS. Neither of those limitations applies to the present proposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. Neither of them, as I understand, would apply to this subject.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then there is no limitation or provision whatever in the Constitution that prohibits this amendment in the conditional form proposed?

Mr. CUMMINS. There are no limitations. I have always believed, Mr. President—if I may continue to answer—that if the matter were ever submitted to the court in a proper way, the court would hold that the States must ratify amendments, under the Constitution as it is, within a reasonable time. What that reasonable time may be would differ with each case.

Mr. BECKHAM. Mr. President, it is of course impossible in the limited time allowed to speak in this debate to discuss at length any of the many features of the important subject now before the Senate. This is an extraordinary occasion in the history of this body. A vote is soon to be taken upon the question of submitting a constitutional amendment providing for nation-wide prohibition, and if this Congress submits this amendment, then the States of the Union will be given an opportunity of determining whether or not it shall become a part of our organic law. If it is submitted and as many as 36 of the States ratify it, it will then become the law of the land. The occasion is especially remarkable in view of the fact that a considerable majority of the Senators, and probably as many as two-thirds of them, favor the amendment and will so vote when the roll is called.

Mr. President, if a dozen or more years ago any man had predicted such an event so soon as this, he would have been considered an idle dreamer, or possibly a lunatic. But conditions have changed swiftly in recent years, and the time has come much sooner than most of the friends of prohibition believed when the Senate of the United States seems ready and anxious by a two-thirds vote to submit this question to the States for their ratification.

The rapid and widespread growth in sentiment favorable to prohibition among the people of this country in recent years is one of the most interesting and remarkable experiences in our history. It has grown in strength not only in our country but throughout the civilized world. It has not been so many years since that for a man to be called a prohibitionist was an offensive epithet, and meant in many instances at least political ostracism. To-day no man needs to defend himself from such a designation. The opponents of prohibition are on the defensive, and are without argument to uphold their cause.

We see in both Houses of Congress substantial majorities in favor of nation-wide prohibition; we see at least one-half of the States now under prohibition laws, and we have reason to believe that the people in many of the other States will adopt it when the opportunity is offered them. Every argument advanced by those opposed to the movement has been met and answered, and the liquor interests of the country to-day stand without a friend that can present a single valid reason to justify their continued existence.

Alcohol used as a beverage has been unmistakably and unanswerably stamped by the medical profession, by other scientists, by the best thought of the age, as a poison. It has been shown by overwhelming evidence that when so used even in moderate quantities it is a positive injury to the human system. It weakens the body, it blurs the mind, it invites disease, and it destroys the soul of man. It produces more pauperism, more crime, more sorrow than all other causes combined. It is the prolific mother of prisons, jails, insane asylums, and almshouses. It has no friends left, except those who manufacture and sell it and make a profit out of the business. It is a curse against which widows and orphans and sorrow-stricken people in every community in our land have lifted up their prayers and have petitioned their Government to abolish.

No one can now stand before an intelligent audience and defend the existence of the saloon. That evil institution is now recognized as one without a saving grace, and as the chief breeding place of human misfortunes and tragedies. That the saloon is doomed is a fact now generally admitted, and another generation will marvel at the patience and forbearance of this generation in tolerating it so long. No State nor city nor community has abolished the saloons that has not been greatly benefited in every way by doing so. Prohibition is not only a moral but also an economic blessing to any State that adopts it. As a revenue producer the liquor business is worse than a failure. It gives only a small percentage of the large sums it takes from the consumers to the support of Government and it weakens the taxpaying powers of the people among whom it is tolerated.

If, therefore, Mr. President, the saloon is bad, what good can there be in the distillery or the brewery whose business it is to manufacture supplies for the saloon? If the one is abolished, why should the other remain? It has been estimated that the amount wasted in this country each year for alcoholic drinks amounts to nearly two and one-half billions of dollars. Think of what an enormous and inexcusable waste of our national wealth, to say nothing of the infinite harm, that its use inflicts upon the people. No good whatever comes from that staggering expenditure, and it is all absolute waste. What a tremendous saving of our national wealth can be accomplished by stopping it altogether. Let the people of this country have the opportunity in the constitutional way to express their wishes in regard to it. Let this Congress at least respond to this unmistakable demand and give the people a chance through their States to ratify this amendment.

This is not simply a war-time movement. The arguments in favor of prohibition have been accentuated, not created, by the existence of the present world-wide war. It is a bad policy to waste wealth in time of peace; it is a worse policy, and may be a fatal policy, to waste it in time of war. I should, Mr. President, support this constitutional amendment in time of peace. I can do so with even greater earnestness at this time when we are engaged in a titanic war and when all of the energies and resources of the Nation and the strength of the people should be conserved. I hope to see this amendment receive the requisite number of votes, both in the Senate and in the House, and that this session of Congress will before its adjournment give to the people the opportunity to settle this question according to their wishes.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD an article by Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale University, on the question of conservation of food by prohibition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

HOW MUCH FOOD CONSERVATION IS POSSIBLE FROM WAR-TIME PROHIBITION AND HOW GREATLY IS IT NEEDED.

(By Irving Fisher, professor of political economy, Yale University.)

LIQUOR USES UP 94,000,000 BUSHELS OF GRAIN A YEAR.

Grain used by brewers, 1916.

[Reported by Department of Agriculture, 1917; figures given to the nearest 100,000 bushels.]

	Bushels.
Barley	52,400,000
Corn	13,600,000
Rice	2,400,000
Total	68,400,000

Grain used by distillers.

[Includes that for industrial alcohol. Internal Revenue report, 1916, figures given to nearest 100,000 bushels.]

	Bushels.
Corn	32,100,000
Barley	4,500,000
Rye	3,100,000
Total	39,700,000

Total grain used by distillers and brewers combined.

[Including that distilled for industrial alcohol.]

	Bushels.
Distillers	39,700,000
Brewers	68,400,000
Total	108,100,000

Negligible amounts of other grains (mostly oats and wheat) are also used.

The quantity of grain used by the distilleries in the manufacture of industrial alcohol is not exactly known, but in 1916 the total quantity of distilled spirits for denaturing, manufacturing, and scientific purposes was 87,000,000 gallons, and that the remainder presumably for human consumption as alcoholic beverages 162,000,000 gallons. In other words, about a third of the total was used industrially. As a much larger proportion of the alcohol from molasses is used industrially than is the case with that from grain, the fraction of the grain so used was probably less than one-third; in other words, the grain used for manufactured alcoholic beverages was more than two-thirds of the total of 39,700,000 bushels, and therefore more than 26,000,000 bushels.

Total grain used in production of alcoholic beverages.

	Bushels.
For distilled liquors	26,000,000
For beer	68,400,000
Total	94,400,000

These 94,000,000 bushels, consisting mostly of (about) 55,000,000 bushels of barley, at 48 pounds per bushel, and (about) 35,000,000 bushels of corn, rice, and rye, at 56 pounds per bushel, make over 4,600,000,000 pounds of grain.

HOW THIS WASTE COULD BE SAVED IN BREAD.

This grain could be exported, or better, used to eke out our own bread supply by mixing with wheat flour and thus releasing the equivalent amount of wheat for export.

It is easy for any cook to mix corn with wheat flour up to 10 per cent. In the Mellon Institute, of Pittsburgh, where bread experiments are being made, mixtures have been successful up to 50 per cent and fairly successful even up to 66 per cent. Barley can be mixed with wheat flour up to 20 per cent by any cook and up to a higher percentage, given the requisite knowledge and skill. Mr. Hoover recently had in his rooms bread containing 20 per cent barley, which could not be detected by its appearance to the eye or by its taste from the original wheat bread. This will probably be a popular form of war bread.

HOW MUCH BREAD COULD BE SAVED.

A pound of grain makes about a pound of bread, for the 25 to 30 per cent of the grain removed by milling is almost exactly replaced in the bread by other ingredients—milk, water, salt, etc.

Thus alcoholic beverages divert from bread making the equivalent of 4,600,000,000 1-pound loaves of bread per annum, or about 12,500,000 1-pound loaves per day.

The cessation of the brewing and distilling of alcoholic beverages would thus enable us to export these 12,500,000 1-pound loaves of bread per day. Even if we make a much larger allowance for the industrial alcohol than we have, the figure will exceed 11,000,000 loaves.

HOW FAR DO BREWERS' AND DISTILLERS' GRAINS HELP THE HUMAN FOOD SUPPLY?

It is true that "brewers' grains" and "distillers' grains"—the waste from the production of alcoholic liquors—while they can not be used directly for human food, contain food value for cattle. When they are fed to cattle part of their food value can be recovered for human food in the form of meat or milk.

The brewers claim that 35 per cent of the original grain is left in the form of brewers' grains. An English statement by Lord Davenport gives the figure in England as 25 per cent. The discrepancy is explained by the fact that the brewers' "35 per cent" is by value and not by weight. In either case only a fraction of this is recoverable in milk and only a very small fraction in meat.

But measurement by weight is very crude. We should measure the results in food units. The food unit is the calorie, which is also a unit of heating power or energy-giving power.

As we have just seen, barley after brewing leaves behind about a third of its weight in dried brewers' grains. As a given weight of these grains possesses only three-fourths the food value of the same weight of barley, it follows that only about one-fourth—i. e., three-fourths of one-third—of the original value is left for cattle feed. A more exact calculation gives the result as 28 per cent.

Similarly, corn after distilling leaves behind somewhat less than a third of its weight in dried distillers' grains. As a given weight of these grains possesses nine-tenths the food value of the same weight of corn, it follows that three-tenths—i. e., nine-tenths of one-third—of the original food value is left for cattle feed. This also, when more exactly calculated, works out at 28 per cent.

When the brewers' and distillers' grains are turned into meat about nine-tenths of the food value is lost in the process. The one-tenth which is recovered is therefore one-tenth of 28 per cent of the original grain, or less than 3 per cent of the food value in the original barley and corn.

If the grains are used for milk production a much larger recovery is secured—about two-thirds of the value of the brewers' and distillers' grains, i. e., two-thirds of 28 per cent, or about 20 per cent of the original food value.

If we count the meat (or milk) thus recovered in terms of equivalent bread the saving from stopping the manufacture of alcoholic beverages would be 3 per cent, or 20 per cent less than 12,500,000 loaves—roughly twelve (or ten) million loaves—let us say 11,000,000 a day.

"MILLER'S OFFAL."

These recoveries, however, must in their turn be partly offset, for the manufacture of liquor takes away a feed that prevents the making of "miller's offal"—amounting usually to about 28 per cent by weight (abroad usually about 40 per cent) of the original grain—which would be created as a by-product if the grain were milled into flour.

These figures for miller's offal relate to wheat and may possibly be different for barley or corn. But the net result would be to raise slightly the net wastage figure (ten to twelve million loaves a day) above obtained.

We conclude that 11,000,000 loaves a day is a fair estimate of the bread supply we are now drinking up.

It should be observed that three-fourths of this food waste is from brewing. The common idea that the distillers are the more important food wasters is erroneous.

ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES NOT PROPERLY FOODS.

No account is here taken of the food value in beer nor of the calories (of little or no use in the human organism) of the alcohol in beer and spirits. As these food and heat values can not be expended without at the same time poisoning the human system with alcohol, it is only technically correct to count even the food value of beer as a real part of the food of the Nation, and, according to the best physiological authorities, it is probably not even technically correct to count the heat value of alcohol as such.

ARE 11,000,000 LOAVES A DAY WORTH COUNTING?

Having secured the figure 11,000,000 loaves as a conservative estimate of the grain waste from alcoholic beverages, we next ask, How important to the Nation is this item?

The distillers and brewers in full-page advertisements have recently been trying to belittle such waste as a small percentage of the grain crop, although a few years ago they were magnifying their use of grain as an important part of the farmer's market. The grain crop is not the right basis of comparison, yet even in relation to the grain crop the waste is nearly 2 per cent. The grain crop includes feeds for horses, cattle, swine, poultry, etc., as well as exports. Prof. Sherman, in Food Products, points out (p. 259) that about nine-tenths of the corn crop is consumed on the farm, and of the one-tenth which is sold not all is used for human food; also (p. 264) that only about one-twentieth of the oat crop is used by milling industries, including that used in breakfast cereals. Only about one-third of the rye crop is made into flour.

The distillers in 1916 consumed over 1 per cent of the total corn consumption by man and beast in the United States, 2 per cent of the total barley consumption, 8 per cent of the total rye consumption. The brewers used over 6 per cent of the total rice consumption, 25 per cent of the total barley consumption.

But it must be remembered that the feeds to cattle, swine, and poultry are recovered in human food only to a very slight extent, and horse feed is not so recovered at all. From the standpoint of our national food supply we ought to compare the 11,000,000 loaves wasted in alcoholic beverages with the total human food values involved. So measured, the waste of 11,000,000 loaves a day is very appreciable.

A pound loaf of bread contains about 1,250 calories, or about half of the average per capita food requirement; 11,000,000 loaves therefore contain calories equal to the total calories required by 5,500,000 people.

Counting our population as 100,000,000, an amount equal, at least, to 5½ per cent of our entire national human food consumption is wasted in alcoholic beverages.

In terms of total breadstuffs the percentage is still greater. The consumption of bread in the United States, including pastry, is estimated by experts at five-sixths of a loaf per capita.

This means that what we waste in beer and spirits is 13 per cent of the total breadstuffs we eat.

WHAT 11,000,000 LOAVES A DAY MEAN IN WAR.

When we turn to the real problem, the war problem, the problem of supplying our allies, the 11,000,000 loaves per day, which means 80,000,000 bushels of grain per year, wasted in the production of alcoholic beverages is nearly 25 per cent of the total food and feed stuffs exported by the United States in 1916, that total being 405,000,000 bushels, made up as follows:

Food and feed stuffs exported from United States in 1916.

Barley, bushels	22,485,920
Corn, bushels	53,543,227
Oats, bushels	101,411,239
Oatmeal, bushels (also large export of oat breakfast cereals)	1,750,000
Rice, bushels	1,330,000
Rye, bushels	15,161,090
Rye flour (bushel rye to make)	500,000
Wheat	154,049,686
Wheat flour (bushel wheat to make 4½ bushels to barrel)	54,705,500
Wheat, bushels (made into bread) (estimated from pounds of breadstuffs)	210,000
Total	405,146,662

WOULD FEED THREE ARMIES.

Again, 11,000,000 loaves a day is enough to supply the bread needs of the English (3,000,000), French (5,300,000), and Italian (3,400,000) armies, counting the bread ration at a little less than 1 pound a day per soldier. It is much more than enough to supply the entire bread relief of Belgium.

This bread waste would more than supply a bread ration of 1-pound loaf a day to all the inhabitants of Scotland and Ireland.

It would nearly supply one-third of the bread ration of England and Wales.

It would more than supply a pound loaf to every one of the 39,600,000 inhabitants of France every four days.

It would furnish half a pound a day to the 1,250,000 dependent children in Belgium, and a pound loaf to every man of the 240,000 in the United States Army Regulars, the 400,000 National Guard, the 500,000 draft, the 5,300,000 in the French Army, and the 3,000,000 in the British Army, and then give a loaf to every one of the million families in New York City.

It is true that we could make these same savings out of our large grain crop in some other way. Instead of stopping or reducing beer and whisky making, we could reduce exports to our allies or reduce the production of milk or meat or reduce the number of horses.

But, seriously and solemnly, are these the places at which to economize rather than economizing on a use which is not only necessary but, as we all know, vastly injurious to the Nation?

DOES LIQUOR MAKING REDUCE THE PRICE OF MILK?

We may pause here to answer an ingenious objection.

The liquor interests in a circular to Congress (signed by the "Farmers' Feed Co.," New York) state that "to eliminate brewers' grains for milch-cattle food will unquestionably lessen milk production 20 per cent; will unquestionably increase the cost of production to such an extent that the purchase price of a quart of milk, now fixed at 11 cents per quart, will unquestionably force the price to 25 or 30 cents per quart in all great centers of population where a pure milk supply is most required."

These bogies need not frighten us, inasmuch as, in the first place, the Department of Agriculture has shown how to secure leguminous foods in substitution, and, in the second place, the brewers' grains could not possibly supply 20 per cent, or even one-third of that figure, of the grain food of milch cattle or even a far smaller percentage of their total food.

According to a table in the Agricultural Outlook, October 15, 1914, Farmers' Bulletin 629, about 9 per cent of the corn crop, 5 per cent of the oat crop, and 4 per cent of the barley crop are used for feeding milch cows. These percentages applied to the production of 1916 would indicate that from these three grains alone, without counting other cattle feeds, the milch cattle obtained 300,000,000 bushels of grain. The entire amount of brewers' grains in that year would, according to the brewers' own claims, not exceed 25,000,000 bushels, or 8 per cent of 300,000,000.

The price of milk may indeed rise from the general war conditions, but the withdrawal of brewers' grains will not be the cause.

One of the chief dairy companies in the United States, when asked this question by our committee replied:

"Probably the single factor of withdrawing brewers' grains from the market would not affect the price of milk or have any material influence on the price of other cattle feeds."

Prohibition would tend greatly to lower the cost of living, including the cost of milk, in many different ways, some direct and others, quite as important, indirect. Some of these will be shown in a later statement on national efficiency in relation to alcohol.

Incidentally, however, we may note that, as we all know, alcoholic beverages now waste both the money and the power to earn money of the poor. Dr. Haven Emerson, health commissioner of New York City, finds, in a recent investigation, that 5 per cent of the income of the poor in New York City is spent on alcoholic beverages. A much larger per cent of earning power is lost thereby. Consequently, out of the saving in both these respects which war-time prohibition would bring, there would be a large net gain for the babies' milk (about which the brewers and distillers are suddenly so solicitous) even if the price of milk should rise several fold.

The economy in buying brewers' and distillers' grains, as compared with other foods, some of which have a great food value per ton, has also been exaggerated.

The prices per ton on May 18, 1917, were as follows:

Spring bran	$42.60
Brewers' grains	43.50
Malt sprouts	45.60
Choice yellow gluten	48.60
Winter wheat middlings	50.10
Oil meal	53.10
Distillers' dried grains	53.10
Corn and oats	61.75

The brewers' and distillers' grains are not regarded as the best cattle feed. They need to be supplemented by other foods, such as miller's grains, and are not used at all by many of the best dairies. This fact is vouched for by one of the best known of these dairies in a letter to this committee.

GRAIN NOT THE ONLY FOOD WASTED.

Besides the grain used in manufacturing alcoholic beverages there is an enormous quantity of molasses and considerable quantities of grape sugar or maltose as well as glucose or sirup so used.

Reduced to pounds the items for 1916 are as follows:

	Pounds.
Barley, 56,513,235 bushels, 48 pounds per bushel	2,712,635,280
Corn, 45,643,063 bushels, 56 pounds per bushel	2,556,011,528
Rye, 3,116,612 bushels, 56 pounds per bushel	174,530,272
Rice	141,249,292
Grape sugar or maltose	54,934,621
Molasses, 152,142,232 gallons, 11 pounds per gallon	1,673,564,552
Glucose or sirup, 2,742,894 gallons, 11 pounds per gallon	30,171,394
	7,343,096,939

These figures include some two-thirds of a billion pounds of grain used in the manufacture of industrial alcohol. The figures have been carefully compiled by Prof. T. M. Carver, of Harvard University, with others, and reviewed by Prof. Cannon, physiologist of the Harvard Medical School, and others.

It has been objected that a large amount of the molasses is not fit for human consumption. A large amount of it, however, is so used, namely, that from the cane-sugar refineries. This is being used in the present sugar shortage, particularly in England and France. That from the beet-sugar refineries is not good for human consumption, but it is good for stock feed and can also be used for the manufacture of industrial alcohol. In short, all of the seven and one-third billion pounds could be utilized otherwise than by manufacture into alcoholic beverages and almost all of it could be used for human food. Probably the total food value wasted, when the items other than grains are included, is a quarter larger than that of the 11,000,000 loaves.

FOOD WASTE IN THE LIGHT OF WORLD FAMINE.

This food waste would be considered important in ordinary times; but in time of war, when there is a great food shortage, the waste is much more serious. The extent of this shortage is not yet realized, although Mr. Hoover has published his findings. These findings are based on studies made by him and his staff in the various countries abroad in collaboration with the food ministers of the various countries. The requirements of bread grains for our allies were calculated by him as follows:

	Bread grains (bushels).	Fodder grains (bushels).
United Kingdom	225,000,000	170,000,000
France	175,000,000	70,000,000
Italy	90,000,000	60,000,000
Belgium and Portugal	50,000,000	.....
European Neutrals	10,000,000	.....
Ex-European Neutrals	5,000,000	116,000,000
Total	555,000,000	416,000,000

This makes a total grain requirement of nearly a billion bushels, of which over half is for human consumption. Mr. Hoover thinks that, while it would be impossible for the United States to supply all of the requirements for grain food for humans and grain fodder for animals, the major part of the burden must fall on us.

Certainly all of the grain we now waste in drink will be needed, and more, for with 20,000,000 men withdrawn from production, with grain fields devastated in France, Belgium, Poland, and Serbia, with grain ships destroyed by submarines, and with short crops at home—the shortage in winter wheat having been estimated by our Department of Agriculture at 189,000,000 bushels—we need food economy as we have never needed it in this country since the Pilgrim Fathers suffered in those historic days, the survival of which led to the establishment of Thanksgiving Day.

The International Bureau of Agriculture at Rome has estimated the shortage of the crops of 1916, as compared with 1915, as follows (1916 shortage relatively to 1915):

	Per cent.
Wheat, 17 leading countries	25.3
Rye, 11 countries	6
Barley, 16 countries	8.6
Oats, 14 countries	13.6
Corn, 6 countries	14.6
Potatoes, 7 countries	13.6

The chief reason why we in America have not yet appreciated the shortage of our food supply is that so far we have eked it out by drawing on reserves. We have been slaughtering animals and reducing their number, and have drawn on foods in cold storage so greatly that the decreases in a year up to March 1 are as follows:

	Per cent.
Cheese (American, pounds)	29.3
Eggs (cases, 30 dozen)	86.3
Lard (pounds)	31.7
Lamb and mutton (pounds)	31.1
Frozen pork (pounds)	36.9

The foregoing table is one of many of great interest on this subject given by Profs. Seager and Chaddock, in Columbia War Papers, series 1, No. 6, division of intelligence and publicity, Columbia University, 1917.

As soon as the people of this country realize that world war is threatening world famine no patriotic citizen, whatever his views on other aspects of the alcohol problem, will hesitate to favor war-time prohibition.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the pending constitutional amendment. There has been so much said upon the subject that I do not feel I can add anything of value. I wish to say, however, that I am in favor of the amendment and expect to vote for it.

Oregon is one of the States recently to adopt prohibition. I think it will be refreshing and perhaps interesting to offer some evidence of the results of prohibition in that State.

In 1915 the State ingrafted an amendment upon the constitution known as the partial-prohibition amendment. In 1917 the State adopted what is known as a bone-dry amendment to the constitution. Consequently Oregon is one of the baby prohibition States. I think the structure of society is about the same the country over, and what necessarily has proven to be a wholesome principle of government for the people of Oregon will necessarily, as a social question, prove to be an excellent rule of conduct to be applied in the Eastern, Southern, Middle, or Western States.

This question might properly be discussed from the standpoint of its economic value or its social effect. It has an equal merit as a political question, as has been stated so splendidly by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. It has been facetiously said of Oregon that it is one of the experimental States in the field of legislation. I accept that statement as an honor. We have introduced several forms of government and have not made a single failure. I am in accord with the Senator from the Pacific coast when he says that it is safe to leave any question with the people.

Within the human minds in our State and along the whole coast there has been clearness of thought and squareness of mind among the people upon all questions of government coming before them to settle, whether it involved a statutory or a constitutional problem. I have abiding faith in the people, and I believe the constitutional amendment should be submitted.

I wish to submit and read a telegram from the governor of our State, Mr. Withycombe, as to the effect of partial prohibition and the effect of bone-dry prohibition, which has obtained in that State since 1915:

SALEM, OREG., July 30, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

General effects of prohibition decidedly good; crimes growing less; jails empty; workingmen more prosperous; committed to penitentiary, 1914, 257; 1915, 261—

I might add that that was before Oregon adopted the prohibition amendment to the constitution—

1916, 148

That was after prohibition had been tried three years, a reduction of 100 per cent.

Savings deposits 1915 thirty-seven and one-half millions, 1916 forty-five and one-quarter millions.

JAMES WITHYCOMBE.

I have a telegram from Mr. John F. Carroll, editor of the Telegram, one of our leading papers, which I will ask permission to have inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., July 31, 1917.

Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Prohibition has had a remarkable tendency to decrease crime and enhance the moral and economic situation in Oregon. This is strikingly illustrated by statistics for the year 1916, when partial prohibition became effective, allowing 2 quarts of whisky or two dozen quarts of malt or vinous liquors a person every 28 days, over 1915. Statistics for 1917, when bone-dry law went into operation, reveal still further increase in morality and economic and a corresponding decrease in crime over 1916. The adoption of prohibition has caused depression in only a few lines of business, and this depression is practically confined to Portland. Investigation by the Portland Chamber of Commerce of conditions throughout the State as a result of prohibition revealed hearty approval by bankers, merchants, shopkeepers, and fathers, with practically no loss of building occupancy in the smaller towns. In these towns bankers and merchants say there is more money, and collection agencies have virtually been put out of business. In Portland, however, according to the chamber's investigation, the immediate results were not so beneficial, but business depression has been limited to hotels, taxicab companies, clubs, and kindred enterprises. Prohibition has seriously affected club life in Portland, members preferring resigning to making up the deficits that followed the closing of the buffets, but Portland has always enjoyed being called a home city and club life has never been a predominant feature of the city. On the other hand, according to the chamber of commerce, all large employers of labor are thoroughly in favor of prohibition, even those who before the election opposed its adoption. It produces efficiency, they assert, and tends to avert accidents, especially Monday mornings. The rent situation in Portland was seriously affected in certain down-town districts. This, however, has almost been remedied. Wholesalers and other merchants declare collections are better and larger quantities of groceries, clothing, shoes, and other necessities are being purchased than before prohibition was adopted. The chamber's investigation also revealed a huge decrease in diseases. Veneral diseases, according to the report of the chamber's committee, have disappeared to such an extent that most of the so-called "specialists" of the medical profession have left the State. Records in the office of the sheriff of Multnomah County show that there are now confined in the county jail one-half the number of prisoners incarcerated in 1916. These records also show there is now 1 arrest where there were 20 in the time when Oregon was wet. In 1915 there were 2,219 commitments to the Multnomah County jail; in 1916 there were 1,482; during the first six months of 1917 there were 914. The last number includes many slacker arrests, pending investigation of registration and other incidents in preparation for war. Police records for Portland show there were 91 arrests for nonsupport in 1915 and 31 in 1916. There were 344 insane commitments in 1915 and 256 in 1916. The police sent 406 vagrants to the county jail in 1915 and 32 in 1916. During the month of December, 1915, there were 215 prisoners in the county jail, and in December, 1916, only 62 prisoners were confined in the jail. Police records also show there were 18,243 arrests in 11 months of 1915, and for the corresponding period of 1916 there were 10,042 arrests. The police arrested 6,305 person for intoxication in 11 months of 1915 and 1,820 persons for that offense during the corresponding period of 1916. In 1915 the Oregon State penitentiary had a population of 566, in 1916 there were 440 persons in the institution. Police records in Portland for the first six months of the current year show that there were approximately half as many arrests as were made for the corresponding period of 1915. Bank clearings for Portland in 1915 amounted to $544,446,756 and in 1916 $649,775,141. Deposits in 1915 amounted to $72,577,031, in 1916 $91,894,478. Savings deposits in banks of the State in 1915 amounted to $21,352,228, and in 1916 $25,445,242. Time deposits in the banks of Oregon for 1915 amounted to $14,835,474, for 1916 $17,932,235. The record for the post office of Portland in 1915 was $1,216,571, for 1916, $1,225,000.

JOHN F. CARROLL.

Mr. MCNARY. I wish to read another telegram. It is from the president of the Anti-Saloon League:

PORTLAND, OREG., July 30.

Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Oregon public sentiment increasingly and overwhelmingly favorable to national prohibition. Have secured data from Mayor Albee—

The mayor of our largest city, Portland—showing first year under prohibition reduced Portland's arrests of drunks and vags from 10,116 to 2,790. Bank deposits increased seven millions. One hundred and six less inmates at county poor farm. Strikes far more easily handled. Salvation Army captain estimates city morals improved 90 per cent.

B. LEE PAGET.

I desire permission also to have printed in the RECORD a telegram from Mr. Baker, president of the Oregon Anti-Saloon League, and also an editorial from the Portland Oregonian, one of the leading and most substantial papers in the West.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PORTLAND, OREG., July 28, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES L. MCNARY,
United States Senator from Oregon,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Economic conditions: Bank clearings 1915 (with saloons), fifty-four millions; 1916, prohibition, forty-nine millions. Bank deposits 1915, seventy-two millions; 1916, ninety-one millions. Savings deposits 1915, fourteen million; 1916, seventeen million. No decrease in population caused by prohibition; practically every business man says prohibition increased business 75 per cent. Old saloon locations snapped up by other business within 30 days. No vacancies now. All classes credit men report business better; collections better. After saloon driven out, hotels, big department stores said business better. Laundry business, milk business, jewelers, motion pictures and theaters, shoe stores, specialty stores, tailor and clothing stores, restaurants; all classes for prohibition. Employers report gain of 25 per cent efficiency of employees, especially logging camps and lumber mills.

Social conditions 1915: Nonsupport cases (Portland), 91; 1916, 31. Insane commitments 1915, 344; 1916, 256. Vagrants (county jail, Multnomah) 1915, 406; 1916, 32 prisoners. Multnomah jail, December, 1915, 215; December, 1916, 61. Arrests by Portland police 11 months 1915, 18,243, 11 months 1916, 10,042. Intoxication cases, 11 months 1915 (Portland), 6,305; 11 months 1916 (Portland), 1,820. Number commitments Oregon State Penitentiary 1915, 566; 1916, 440.

Public officials of Oregon say: Gov. Withcombe, proving phenomenal success from economic and moral standpoint. Albee, mayor, one of greatest forward steps ever taken by city. Alderman, superintendent of schools, school children better clothed, fed, shod; attendance improved materially. Walter Evans, district attorney, crime cut in two. Clark, chief of police, from police standpoint a good thing. Hurlburt, sheriff, moral effects wholly good. Steiner, superintendent State Insane Hospital, decreased number insane commitments, and is bound decrease prevalence of paresis. Langguth, municipal judge, good thing in every particular.

BAKER, President Oregon Anti-Saloon League.

[From Portland Oregonian of Dec. 31, 1916.]

DRY OREGON GROWS.

The recent investigation led into almost every avenue of trade, for the purpose of learning just how business had been affected.

With the exception of those lines dependent directly or partly on the saloon business for their business not a single merchant reported that prohibition had hurt him.

Contrary to expectations the laundry business has not suffered. Laundries did a heavy business in washing bartenders' jackets and aprons and supplying towels, but they have made that up by branching into the domestic trade, and a canvass of their books shows an increase of about 5 per cent.

All lines of legitimate merchandise have improved. This seems to be particularly true of jewelry stores. Men who formerly spent their money for drinks now are buying jewelry. One jeweler only a block from the water front opposed prohibition vigorously in 1914. Within a block of his store were seven saloons. When the State went dry he tried to sell out. He could not. An ironical turn of fate placed jewelry stores in two of the rooms vacated by saloons. Then he tried to close out. In the process he found his business growing. Now he is doing 20 per cent more business than a year ago.

Motion-picture theaters, vaudeville theaters, and all public amusement houses are doing more business than ever.

Shoe stores also report an improvement, particularly in the part of the west side east of Third Street. Shoe dealers agree that they are selling a greater proportion of children's shoes now than they did a year ago. The assertion that children are better shod is corroborated by the school authorities.

The big specialty stores and big department stores are unanimous in the assertion that prohibition has not hurt their business. All of them are doing more business now than a year ago.

A prominent merchant tailor who worked hard against prohibition two years ago now asserts that he would work just as hard the other way; that men are now buying better clothes and a greater percentage are paying cash for them.

Every credit man reports that collections are better under prohibition. This is particularly true of the smaller stores. The big wholesale houses report that their collections are better.

The passing of the saloon has left no abnormal number of vacant storerooms. In the main business district all but three of the rooms formerly occupied by saloons are now filled with legitimate lines of business. More than 75 per cent of the old saloon locations were snapped up by other business men within a month after the saloons went out of business.

Prohibition Portland has attracted more tourists than Portland with its saloons ever did in a normal year.

All the first-class hotels report better business this year than in any normal year before the saloons were wiped out. Naturally those hotels that made a heavy profit from their bars are suffering just that much less, but their other departments continue to make money. Some of them are absorbing the losses due to the elimination of the bar by the increased business in their rooms and restaurants. Hotel men say there is no reason why a hotel should depend on its saloon to carry along the rest of the house any more than a good department store allows its shoe business, for instance, to carry the losses of its dress-goods department.

Employers assert that those of its employees formerly inclined to drink have gained fully 25 per cent in efficiency. This is particularly true of logging-camp operators.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the temperance movement in the United States may be divided into three epochs. The movement was first started by the appeal to the individual. Temperance societies were formed. The people were asked to sign pledges to abstain from the use of intoxicating liquor, and a considerable advance was made thereby. However, we know that such promises are often broken under exposure to the allurements of the saloon, and many signers of the pledge fell victims to temptation. It is still true as it was in Shakespeare's time that "If to do were as easy as to know what were good to do, chapels had been churches and poor men's cottages princes' palaces."

Because of failure to produce the expected results the temperance people saw it was necessary to take a further step in the direction of obtaining abstinence.

STATE PROHIBITION.

The second movement was an appeal for restrictive legislation by the States, namely, high license; an appeal to cities to pass ordinances prohibiting the use of intoxicating liquors in wards and cities; and appeals for local-option laws in counties; and at last State-wide prohibition.

It is needless to say, Mr. President, that the use of intoxicating liquor has been demonstrated by the medical fraternity to be most deleterious to health. A little book came to me on yesterday entitled "Alcohol," by Eugene Lyman Fisk, in which I have found some very valuable information. I found that in England of the people who abstained from the use of intoxicating liquor 37 per cent less died than those of the ordinary risks in the life insurance companies of Great Britain. In other words, the man who abstained lived longer, he was a better risk. Speaking of the British Life Assurance Co., it is interesting to note this paragraph:

This institution was founded at a time when the total abstainer was looked upon as a "queer duck," probably mentally unbalanced and certainly physically weak. In fact, this particular company was founded by a man who had been asked to pay an extra premium because he insisted on being a total abstainer.

* * * * * * *

It is of interest to know that, while in the course of the company's whole experience the excess mortality among users was 37 per cent, the mortality among users between the ages of 35 and 40 was 83 per cent in excess, showing the influence of some extremely unfavorable factor at that critical period.

The American insurance statistics show practically the same facts.

Mr. President, a powerful reason why the States should have enacted legislation establishing prohibition is found in statistics which show that the paupers in prohibition States are only 46 to every 100,000 of population, that in the near prohibition States they are 54, that in the 13 partially licensed States they are 123, and in the 9 license States the ratio is 127 paupers to every 100,000 of population.

Statistics taken from the United States census reports show that in prohibition States only 118 are insane to every 100,000 of population; in near prohibition States the number is 150, in partially license States it is 242, and in license States it is 276 insane out of every 100,000 inhabitants.

The increase of the products of manufacture in States during the 10 years preceding 1909 has likewise shown the advantages of prohibition. In dry States the increase of products manufactured has been 116.3 per cent, in near prohibition States 85.6 per cent, in partially license States 82.2 per cent, and in license States 73.7 per cent.

The United States census reports also show that the number of crimes committed in prohibition States is far less than in the States where liquor is sold. It is the saloon that attracts the criminal, and it is the saloon that lures so many of the young men of our country to their destruction.

In Fisk on Alcohol, at page 183, I find the following:

At the meeting of the American Medical Association held on June 6, 1917, Dr. Charles H. Mayo, the noted surgeon, in his presidential address stated that the only legitimate use for alcohol was in the arts and sciences, and that its use in medicine had become greatly restricted because other less menacing drugs and remedial measures could be used instead.

The association then passed the following resolution:

Whereas we believe that the use of alcohol is detrimental to the human economy; and

Whereas its use in therapeutics as a tonic or stimulant or for food has no scientific value: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Medical Association is opposed to the use of alcohol as a beverage.

The Pirogov Society, the leading medical association of Russia, on May 29, 1915, approved and published a document containing the following:

Scientific facts (drawn from physiology, pathology, and clinical experience) compel us to place alcohol and substances containing alcohol in the class of poisonous and injurious things. Alcohol is a typical narcotic poison, which taken in small doses from the beginning disturbs the highest functions of the brain cells and consequently causes a series of pleasant but illusory feelings of warmth, energy, bravery, etc. * * *

The use of small doses of alcohol—always a narcotic poison—develops in some men whose constitutions are weak severer forms of alcoholism, that are obviously the cause of much personal and social unhappiness. It has been proved that a regular consumption of small doses increases morbidity, mortality, the number of accidents, mental sicknesses, suicides, crime of every type, a both qualitative and quantitative minus of capacity in both mental and physical work. The concept "moderation" can not be used for habitual use of alcoholic drinks since the customary use of a poison is nonmoderation and misuse.

These are some of the reasons why the States took hold of the question and passed high license and prohibition statutes for cities and towns and finally for the States themselves.

Yet, Mr. President, notwithstanding these laws, we have not been able to enforce absolute prohibition. And why? It is because surrounding the States that have established prohibition are States that declare it lawful to sell intoxicating liquors, and it is impossible to prevent the importation of liquor into prohibition States so situated. Consequently, notwithstanding prohibition has been extending until now it is the law in about 26 States, yet it is impossible to enforce absolute prohibition under that system.

From the Statistical Abstract for 1916 I take the following, showing the consumption in gallons per capita of intoxicating liquors:

	Distilled.	Wines.	Malt.	Total.
Average of 1881 to 1890	1.34	0.48	11.38	13.20
1916	1.35	.46	17.59	19.40

Mr. President, what necessity, then, arises from that condition? The necessity of having a Nation-wide prohibition constitutional amendment. That is the necessity. That seems the only remedy to prevent the shipment of liquor from one State to another.

I heard the colloquy between the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] as to whether the prohibition law in Kansas had been a success.

One declared that it had been and the other insisted that it had not, but every contention of the Senator who declared the law a failure demonstrated the necessity for a national constitutional amendment. The very thing that prevented the State of Kansas from enforcing absolute prohibition was the fact that liquors from other States adjoining had been surreptitiously taken into that State.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that when the temperance people have tried in two different ways to get absolute prohibition and have not been completely successful, the last resort and the third appeal should be made to the Nation. The Nation is deeply interested in this question. It has been said that the War College division of the United States Army made an estimate of the number of killed and wounded in the wars of all history from 500 years before Christ to the Russian-Japanese War of a few years ago, and it was found that in all those wars the total killed and wounded was 2,800,000 men, and of that number it was estimated that 700,000 were killed and 2,100,000 wounded.

Mr. President, it is also stated that Mr. Hobson in a lecture that the number of deaths from alcohol among the people of the white race in the world is 3,500,000 every year. If that is true you can readily see that war losses are but an inconsiderable fraction compared to the losses chargeable to the account of intoxicating liquors. It is said, therefore, that every year there die from the use of intoxicating liquors five times as many persons as the total of all the victims in the wars of the world for 2,300 years.

The National Government can more certainly enforce its liquor legislation. The Federal courts are feared, and hence laws will be observed. As a State can not under our dual form of government establish complete prohibition, any State is justified in urging a national constitutional amendment for prohibition for its own protection. Otherwise 36 States could not protect themselves against 12 Commonwealths. What a great interest, then, has the Nation to see that her citizens are preserved, ready to defend her in all times of stress and need.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, when the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] was suggested to me I said I would not support it under any circumstances. I said I would not vote for any limitation upon the submission of the constitutional amendment. Furthermore, I expressed the opinion then that has been expressed here by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and by other Senators—that Congress has no power to put in a limitation of that kind.

But, Mr. President, after more consideration and reflection and ascertaining the situation in the Senate, I have changed my mind with reference to my vote upon the amendment. I have determined that I will vote for that amendment largely for the reason stated by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. Everybody recognizes that it is very difficult to get a two-thirds vote in the Senate upon a proposition about which there is serious controversy. A very careful investigation has convinced some of us that a two-thirds vote is very uncertain unless this limitation is put on. Some Senators feel that without the limitation they can not vote for the resolution. They feel that with the limitation they can vote for it.

It seemed to me, as a friend of the resolution, that I could afford to vote for a provision that would very likely insure the submission of this amendment to the people of the country and give an opportunity for the adoption of that which so many of us are very earnestly in favor of.

I will say frankly that this phase of the matter also influenced me. If the amendment is submitted with this limitation, and it is not ratified in six years, there is nothing to prevent Congress from a resubmission. In my judgment it will be ratified in six years; but suppose it is not and lacks simply one or two States. If two-thirds of the States of the country have voted to ratify the amendment, there is no power on earth that can prevent Congress from resubmitting it immediately, and Congress will do it. The liquor interests—I do not refer to anybody in the Senate—but the liquor interests that would like to see a limitation of this kind would like to see the resolution defeated. They should recognize now, and this is not uttered as a threat, but it is simply based upon the sentiments and conditions throughout the country, that their business is doomed, and that if this limitation is put on and the amendment is not ratified in six years it will be resubmitted, if necessary, and the contest will go on until it is settled in the right sort of a way.

Now, looking at it in that way, I can not see anything that the friends of temperance will lose by the adoption of the resolution with the amendment of the Senator from Ohio upon it. I do not think it ought to be put on. I think that this amendment ought to be treated just as every other constitutional amendment has been treated in the past. We never have submitted a constitutional amendment with a limitation of this kind before, but it simply illustrates what the temperance forces are up against in their contest with the liquor traffic. Whatever they get they must get by main strength, to use a common expression, by main strength and pure awkwardness. We have to take whatever we can get and then go forward for something else. It is just like the condition of the allies on the western battle fronts of Europe. They have to go forward inch and trench at a time. That seems to be the condition which confronts us on this proposition.

I recognize, as has been suggested by the Senator from Iowa, that it may give rise to litigation and matters of that kind, but that will not delay matters any more than we will be delayed if we fail to pass the resolution at this time. I am willing to take the resolution with this limitation upon it in order to have the amendment submitted and give the people of the country an opportunity to pass upon it, because I believe they will act favorably within the six years. If they do not act favorably within the six years there is nothing to prevent us from resubmitting it to the States at the end of six years, and we will resubmit it if necessary.

I am inclined to think also that if this limitation is put on the contention of Senators is correct, and it is the view that I really hold with reference to the matter, that if Congress has not the power to put that limitation on it will not affect the amendment; it is not any part of the amendment. The very language of the resolution determines and specifies what the amendment is, and that is the proposition which is submitted to the States. If the Supreme Court should hold that we went beyond our power in putting on this limitation—and I believe it would hold that it would not affect the amendment itself; I may be mistaken, but even if it should we have not lost anything, in my judgment.

So, Mr. President, for these reasons I am going to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. VARDAMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. VARDAMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not to be taken out of the time of the Senator from Mississippi, I wish to make a suggestion, which I have a perfect right to make in my own time. I am very earnestly for the proposed amendment of the Constitution. I do not want to divide the friends of the resolution. I feel impelled to oppose the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, but under the circumstances I withdraw the amendment which I offered to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, for me to express my views upon this question would be but to repeat a thrice-told tale vexing the dull ears of a hot and weary Senate. My first political service was rendered in opposition to the open saloon. In those days in Mississippi to fight the liquor traffic was not a pleasant pastime. In some communities the men interested in the saloon business and their patrons regarded the temperance advocate as a usurper—one who was trying to take from them the blood-bought privileges of citizenship.

Notwithstanding that trying ordeal, I have advocated prohibition in the towns, cities, counties of my State, and finally the State and the Nation all these years even before I became a voter.

I have looked forward to this day with longing and with high hopes of what it may bring to the people of America. I wish that Congress had the power to enact a law this afternoon prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. I would have action immediately.

As has been so clearly and conclusively stated on the floor of the Senate this afternoon, the liquor traffic is probably the most insidious economic enemy to the human race and liquor itself the most destructive poison that ever polluted the blood of men or fired the heart to dastardly things.

I shall not vote for the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], because I believe the purpose of that amendment is not to promote the cause of prohibition or further the cause of temperance. Whatever may be the protestations, I can not believe that any Senator opposed to the resolution providing for nation-wide prohibition will be induced to vote for that resolution because of the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio. Senators opposed to the so-called Sheppard resolution will not support it if the Harding amendment shall be adopted unless the so-called Harding amendment gives the whisky interests some decided advantage.

Now, regardless of the constitutional objection urged by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], if this resolution shall be agreed to by the States, there is no doubt in my mind but that it will stand the test in the courts and prohibition will exist throughout the Republic. But if the six years shall elapse before the adoption by the States of this resolution, it is my judgment that it will require another six years before we can hope to carry the constitutional amendment through all the State legislatures. I think the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio will be surrendering a great deal to the advocates of the liquor cause. It means delay in the consummation of the great scheme for national prohibition for which we have worked and the good women have prayed for all these years.

I repeat, Mr. President, that I do not believe the joint resolution offered by the Senator from Texas will receive a single additional vote on its final passage because of the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio. I think the issue ought to be made squarely. I am opposed to muddying the waters or throwing dust in anybody's eyes. I think it will be eminently unfortunate for Congress to write something into the joint resolution not authorized by the Constitution, the effect of which will be to hinder, delay, and create doubt as to what the resolution really means and finally defeat its purposes. The cause of temperance is a holy cause. This campaign for prohibition is inspired by the loftiest motive and highest altruism, and I do not think the cause would be promoted by accepting this amendment or anything akin to it. I believe the righteousness of the cause for which we contend demands that our fight be made along straight lines. Let this joint resolution be passed unamended, so that the American people can know exactly what they get when it is passed.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Mississippi?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. VARDAMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. STONE. The Senator says that he does not believe that a single vote would be added to the final vote for the joint resolution offered by the Senator from Texas by adding to it the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio. The Senator ought not to say that, I submit to him, when Senators on the floor and otherwise have given assurance that they would vote for the joint resolution if it were so amended.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I have not heard a Senator make that statement. I heard the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] state a moment ago that he had been assured that Senators would so vote, but I can not understand why a Senator would vote for the joint resolution if he is opposed to prohibition. What advantage is to be gained by his side of the question by the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, unless it is that it shall give the whisky interests some advantage in the ratification of the amendment by the States? If that be true, certainly no friend of prohibition should consent to the amendment. To do so would be an unfortunate surrender by the friends of prohibition to the advocates of the liquor traffic.

That is all I have to say, Mr. President. I am going to vote for the joint resolution providing for nation-wide prohibition, and, as I have so often said heretofore upon the floor of the Senate, I hope from the depths of my heart that the joint resolution may receive the constitutional two-thirds majority, and as a result America may become a Nation of sober and temperate people, holding the preservation of the body and the salvation of the soul of more value than sordid gold.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I ask leave at this time to submit an amendment, so that it may be considered as pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be received and considered as pending.

Mr. PHELAN. May I ask to have it read, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following two amendments to the Constitution be, and hereby are, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. The manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, and the exportation thereof from, the United States and all territories subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited: Provided That this article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, on or before the 1st day of July, A. D. 1927.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I do not think the Secretary read the alternative amendment which I submitted. I beg to call attention to the fact that I proposed two amendments. One is the Sheppard amendment with the addition of the time limitation, and the second amendment proposes to strike out the word "intoxicating" and to substitute the words "distilled spirituous," so that the people of the States will have the alternative of either abolishing the manufacture of whisky, wine, and beer, or of whisky only. I ask that my second amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. The manufacture, sale, or transportation of distilled spirituous liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from, the United States and all territories subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited: Provided, That this article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, on or before the 1st day of July, A. D. 1927.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I do not entertain the fears which have been expressed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] or the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and other distinguished Senators in this Chamber regarding the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. No one appreciates the high capacity, the unquestioned integrity, or the devotion to prohibition of these Senators more than I. I am unable, however, to sympathize with the misgivings which they entertain. I do not believe that any limitation exists upon the power of Congress to submit a question to the States or as to the terms in which that question may be expressed. This amendment by its own terms provides that it shall be inoperative unless ratified by a three-fourths vote of the States within six years. Suppose that three-fourths of the States should not ratify the amendment by that time. There is nothing to prevent them from continuing to vote, but such a course would be so useless that it would not be pursued. Suppose three-fourths of the States should ultimately vote to adopt the amendment after six years had passed. They would have adopted an amendment that by its very terms had already become inoperative.

Besides, as the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has said—and I desire to confirm everything he has said—if three-fourths of the States should not have voted at the end of six years, resubmission could be had immediately. In my judgment the cause of prohibition will have received such an impetus by the submission of this amendment that if not adopted within six years, adoption will be inevitable within only a year or two after resubmission. It is my belief that the amendment will be adopted by three-fourths of the States within six years.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, before the Senator from Texas——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STONE. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator was about to sit down, and I wanted to say a word or two.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I yield.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, this one amendment has been pending before the Senate for three hours. There are other amendments of very great importance, and we have to begin voting at 4 o'clock. After that all debate will be at an end. In good faith, under the rule we have agreed to, I submit to the Senator from Texas and to the Senate that we ought to vote upon the pending amendment and give an opportunity to present other amendments and to say a few words about them.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I am in entire sympathy with what the Senator from Missouri says, and if I had not felt it incumbent upon me to say what I have said I should not have taken the floor.

I merely wish to say that every amendment in the Constitution to-day was adopted within six years after it had been presented for ratification, and that the majority of these amendments have been adopted within less than two years. If there is any trick in the presentation of this amendment, that trick will be turned against its proposers.

Let me say that on looking carefully into the situation I found that this amendment could be voted on and could in all probability be passed if such an amendment as this could be added. I hope, therefore, that it will be agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I have not occupied a moment of the Senate's time on this question, and in view of what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has just said, I shall not even take the 10 minutes which I am allowed under the unanimous-consent agreement. I would not, if I had the time, go into the merits of this question; it is not necessary for me to do that. I represent a State which has never had a licensed saloon since it became a State. We know the value of prohibition; we know what it has done for the people of that State morally and financially.

But, Mr. President, I rose merely to express my disapproval of the amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING]. To me, being a layman, it is really remarkable that there should be any disagreement among lawyers as to the constitutionality of the amendment offered by the Senator. To a layman it is perfectly plain that that amendment would not be a part of the Constitution unless adopted as a separate provision; it could not be. But if the proposed amendment is submitted to the people of this country illegally the courts will have to hold that Congress exceeded its authority and that it had been illegally submitted to the people.

I desire to say to those Senators who are anxious to have this amendment adopted, do not forget that you are allowing six years' time for this amendment to be either approved or rejected. I believe it would be better for the people of this country and for those who are in favor of national prohibition to have the amendment defeated to-day than to present a sham and a fraud to the American people. The very arguments used by distinguished Senators on the floor will be used by the liquor interests; the very statements which have been made by eminent Senators and constitutional lawyers will be the very weapons seized upon by the liquor interests of this country; and they will say, "It makes no difference to us whether you approve or reject the amendment, because it is clearly unconstitutional."

If this proposed constitutional amendment were defeated to-day, it could again be acted upon by Congress and submitted to the people in the way that all constitutional amendments have been submitted. When a moral and economic question like this is to be submitted to the American people, I ask why is it necessary to proceed in such an unusual way and place a limitation upon it? Such a thing has never been done in the history of this country. I would not object to a proposal general in character which would place a time limit upon the ratification of any proposed constitutional amendment presented to the American people; but, Mr. President, I do not believe it is fair to those who are honestly in favor of prohibition to hamstring this proposed amendment by placing a limitation upon it when Senators, who are eminent lawyers, have expressed the opinion that it is very likely to be held to be unconstitutional. It has been stated by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], and by other Senators that, in their judgment, the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio would be likely to result in having the whole amendment declared unconstitutional. For that reason, Mr. President, I can not vote for the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio. I had hoped that I would be allowed to vote for a plain, simple amendment to the Constitution giving the people of this country the right to determine whether or not they desire constitutional prohibition.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE and Mr. STERLING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have never believed in the principle of prohibition and therefore have never supported it. I do not believe that it offers the best method of dealing with the problem involved.

No statute can vindicate itself. Except the citizenship of a county, a State, a community can in truth say, "This law is bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh"; it can not be a living, vital, enforcible statute.

The laws of our country rest not upon the bayonets of an army but upon the convictions of the people. All laws must be enforced locally. Wherever the matured, settled purpose of a majority of a community supports a law, that law will be enforced. Wherever a law is imposed upon one community against its will by those outside of that community, it is very certain to fail of enforcement to such an extent as to bring reproach upon all law and order within the community.

I think never in my political experience have I had the support of the prohibitionist, and it is very certain that I have uniformly had the opposition of the brewing interests of Wisconsin. So I can fairly say that my course upon legislation involving prohibition has been one altogether uninfluenced by questions of political expediency.

But, sir, for 30 years I have been at all times devoted to the principles of democracy. I believe that the voters of the country should have a larger and ever a larger voice in their Government.

If it were within my power to do so, I should give to the citizenship of the country the power under the initiative and the referendum and the recall to—

First. Initiate legislation and the submission of constitutional amendments for a vote of the people whenever their legislative representatives neglect or refuse to respond to the public will in the enactment of any law or the submission of any constitutional amendment demanded by a majority of the voters concerned;

Second. To veto and annul any bad law enacted by their representatives; and Third. To recall all representatives who dishonor their commission by betraying the public interest.

If the people of this country possessed the power which the referendum would invest them with, the draft law would be promptly referred to the voters of the country to determine whether it should remain the law or be repealed or annulled.

If the right to initiate legislation had been conferred upon the people of this country, they would not have been obliged to wait 40 years from the time when they began to demand of Congress the enactment of a law for postal savings banks, before Congress finally passed such a law, nor would the people have been denied by Congress the enactment of the parcels-post law for 25 years, nor compelled to wait 17 years for the passage of a pure-food law to prevent the sale of adulterated and poisonous foods and drugs.

If the people had been in possession of the power to initiate and submit a constitutional amendment for the voters of the country to pass upon through their legislatures or through conventions to be held as provided in the Constitution, then they would not have been obliged to wait for 80 years from the time they first petitioned Congress for an opportunity to so amend their Constitution as to enable them to elect United States Senators by direct vote.

Mr. President, if the people had been in possession of the power to initiate and submit constitutional amendments, they would not have been compelled to wait 14 years for Congress to give them the chance to so amend their Constitution so as to tax the incomes of the rich, which were in the main escaping taxation altogether. And, sir, the people would within the last three years have initiated the submission of an amendment so changing the Constitution that the Congress, excepting in case of actual invasion of our soil, could pass no declaration of war without a final vote of approval thereon by the people, who are compelled to fight the battles and foot the bills.

Without the right to initiate such a constitutional amendment, as the result of the experiences that have come upon us within the last six months, I venture the prediction that this body will be compelled to give the people a voice in declaring war.

Mr. President, while I believe that the people have in large measure lost control of their Government and while I believe the proof is overwhelming that Congress does not respond in the enactment of legislation to the will of the people, still, sir, I do not believe that government of the people, for the people, by the people has perished from the earth. If it had, there might be some occasion for jubilation behind some of the desks on this floor. I believe that I shall live to see real representative government, a government by and for the people, brought back to the people again. I have faith.

And, sir, I shall, so long as I remain in public life, do all within my power to make the will of the people the law of the land.

I should be untrue to my convictions in support of democracy, if I did not vote to give the people a right to pass upon the pending amendment to the Constitution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Wisconsin has expired. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio. [Putting the question.]

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr TOWNSEND's name was called). I desire the RECORD to show that my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is detained from the Chamber on account of sickness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. ROBINSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have been advised that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] would vote on the submission of this amendment as I myself intend to vote, and I therefore voted. I have in my hand a telegram to his colleague, which, with the consent of his colleague, I will ask to have inserted in the RECORD. I do not know how my pair would vote on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, and I therefore withdraw my vote on that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator, without objection, will be granted and the telegram inserted in the RECORD.

The telegram is as follows:

JACKSON, MICH., July 30, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM ALDEN SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Regret that sickness in my family compels my remaining in Jackson. I believe that the States should settle the prohibition question through a constitutional amendment. If I were present, I should vote to submit amendment. Am paired with Senator ROBINSON.

CHAS. E. TOWNSEND.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Chamber by illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

Gore	McCumber	Thomas

So Mr. HARDING's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. It is to be inserted as a separate section. I have not inserted the number of the section, leaving that to be arranged later.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert in the joint resolution a new section, to precede the last section of the joint resolution, as follows:

SEC. —. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation; but this article shall not be enforced until the Congress shall have made provision for the ascertainment and payment of damages to the property employed in the manufacture of said liquors resulting from the enforcement of this article.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, on yesterday I discussed at some length this question of compensation. I regret that the attendance upon the Senate at that time was very much less than it is now.

Mr. President, the amendment I offer proposes that the Congress shall, by legislation—such legislation as the Congress at that time shall consider advisable—provide compensation for damages done—to what? Done to property used or employed in the manufacture of the liquors the manufacture of which would be prohibited by the pending amendment, and that is all there is to it.

I can not at this time, for lack of time, discuss the wisdom or the justice of this amendment. I did that yesterday to the best of my ability. It is a question the justice of which must appeal to the judgment of every Senator. The merits of the proposal rest on the eternal, fundamental principle of right that the Congress—aye, even that the people of the United States themselves—can not take the private property of private citizens without just compensation. An act of that kind would be fundamentally wrong and violative of public morality.

That is all I have to add to what I said on yesterday.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I see no reason why it should be adopted. The people who are engaged in the brewery and distillery business are engaged in a business that has been declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to be of such a character that if the legislature of a State, and therefore if the Congress of the United States, should legislate them out of business, they have no right to claim pay for their breweries and for their distilleries.

I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate longer than to read a paragraph from a decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Mugler against Kansas, a case which went up on account of the laws enacted in the State of Kansas, where no pay was provided for the breweries and distilleries. It will be found in the One hundred and twenty-third United States Supreme Court Reports, and I will read from page 669:

It is true that when the defendants in these cases purchased or erected their breweries the laws of the State did not forbid the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. But the State did not thereby give any assurance or come under an obligation that its legislation upon that subject would remain unchanged. Indeed, as was said in Stone against Mississippi, above cited, the supervision of the public health and the public morals is a governmental power "continuing in its nature," and "to be dealt with as the special exigencies of the moment may require," and that "for this purpose the largest legislative discretion is allowed and the discretion can not be parted with any more than the power itself." So in Beer Co. against Massachusetts (97 U. S., 32): "If the public safety or the public morals require the discontinuance of any manufacture or traffic the hand of the legislature can not be stayed from providing for its discontinuance by any incidental inconvenience which individuals or corporations may suffer.

I should also like, as I shall not have time to read them, to have printed in the RECORD two paragraphs from the syllabus in this case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Lawful State legislation in the exercise of the police powers of the State to prohibit the manufacture and sale within the State of spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage may be enforced against persons who at the time happen to own property whose chief value consists in its fitness for such manufacturing purposes without compensating them for the diminution in its value resulting from such prohibitory enactments.

A prohibition upon the use of property for purposes that are declared by valid legislation to be injurious to the health, morals, or safety of the community is not an appropriation of property for the public benefit in the sense in which a taking of property by the exercise of the State's power of eminent domain is such a taking or appropriation.

Mr. CURTIS. And, Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], I ask that the letter I send to the desk be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

THE ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE OF AMERICA,
LEGAL DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., August 1, 1917.

Senator WESLEY JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR JONES: There are many reasons why an amendment such as the one proposed by the Senators from Missouri should be defeated. Among them are the following:

First. The courts have repeatedly held that when a person engages in a traffic which is a menace to the morals and health of the people he has no right to complain when the people use their inherent right to destroy such a traffic.

The United States Supreme Court, in the case of Muggler v. Kansas (123 U. S., 625), in referring to this power of the State to prohibit the liquor traffic, said it "can not be burdened with the condition that the State must compensate such individual owners for the pecuniary losses they sustain by reason of their not being permitted by a noxious use of their property to inflict injury upon the community."

Second. If the liquor interests thought they had a good case under the Constitution to ask for compensation, they would go into the courts and establish their claim. If a legislative body should prohibit a traffic which has inherent rights to exist, the owners of that traffic would have no difficulty in establishing their claim and receive compensation.

The liquor traffic has been characterized by the Supreme Court of the United States as "A source of crime and misery to society" (137 U. S., 86). A source of crime and misery may be permitted by the people, but it has no inherent right to exist. When the people exercise their rights such a traffic can not justly complain. Liquor dealers took a gambler's chance when they entered the business, knowing that the temporary permit which was given them might be revoked by the people at any time, and any money investment in this traffic carried this risk.

Third. Twenty-six States have abolished the liquor traffic and provided no compensation for liquor dealers. A large part of the wet States have voted "dry" and liquor dealers have not been compensated for their loss. Why should the 85 per cent of the territory that is now dry be asked to help bear the burden of compensating the liquor traffic in the few remaining States that are wet? The effect of such an amendment would make it much more difficult to secure the ratification of the amendment in these States. If a time limit should also be added it would preclude the possibility of ratification of the amendment in the form submitted.

Fourth. A provision for compensation, even if it were just and practicable, should not be written into the Constitution. There are so many details which would enter into a provision of this kind that it would be impossible to draft it in the form which would be appropriate for the organic law.

No State or nation has ever written into its constitution a provision that its legislative body could not prohibit the liquor traffic or any other evil without first paying the trafficker in evil a compensation before such provision would take effect.

We can not believe that the Members of the Senate will support an amendment of this kind, which has no precedent and which, in the judgment of the majority of the States, has no merit.

Yours, very cordially W. B. WHEELER,
Attorney and General Counsel.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the opinion which the Senator from Kansas has referred to is directly in point. I want to read a condensed syllabus of that opinion. It seems to me to state this matter very clearly and very conclusively. It is in the One hundred and twenty-third United States, at page 623. It says:

Lawful State legislation in the exercise of the police powers of the State to prohibit the manufacture and sale within the State of spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented, or other intoxicating liquors, to be used as a beverage, may be enforced against persons who at the time happen to own property whose chief value consists in its fitness for such manufacturing purposes without compensating them for the diminution in its value resulting from such prohibitory enactments.

It is based upon the general police power of the State to prohibit nuisances; and whenever a business is engaged in which, in the judgment of the State, is detrimental to the public health it has a right to prohibit it without any payment of compensation. In this instance there were three cases merged. An injunction was sought to restrain the enforcement of a statute giving the power to suppress the nuisance in the manufacture by a brewery of malt liquors.

The syllabus of the case further says:

A prohibition upon the use of property for purposes that are declared by valid legislation to be injurious to the health, morals, or safety of the community is not an appropriation of property for the public benefit in the sense in which a taking of property by the exercise of the State's power of eminent domain is such a taking or appropriation.

The destruction in the exercise of the police power of the State of property used in violation of law in maintaining a public nuisance is not a taking of property for public use, and does not deprive the owner of it without due process of law.

Everybody who engages in the liquor business knows full well when he enters it that the State or city has the power to impose such high license as will put him out of business and the power to prohibit the sale of liquor without any compensation to him. He therefore takes that into consideration when he establishes his business and relies upon large profits to enable him to take the risk.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that that decision is clearly against the position taken by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I submitted a moment ago an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] whereby two constitutional amendments would be submitted to the people, one in the terms of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas, and the other in terms by which the people would have the alternative right, through their legislatures, of voting for the prohibition of distilled liquors only, so that vinous and malt liquors might still be manufactured and used.

We have heard much here about the duty of Congress to submit to the legislatures any or all constitutional amendments on the theory that the legislatures should make the decision. I am disposed to dissent from that view, because I can well understand that when the Constitution makers determined a method of amendment of the Constitution they certainly must have held that any measure which would receive the approval and concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate and two-thirds of the House was well on its way to passage; that the indorsement which it received from the fountain head of the Government at Washington might well be expected to carry it through the States, and then, if the States also concurred, doubtless it would be a wise enactment. But Senators are abrogating their privileges. They are surrendering their discretion and turning over the determination of important matters to the legislatures where special interests, actuated by good and bad motives, have, we are well aware as a matter of political experience, easy facilities for winning majorities.

Therefore I think the Senate ought to exercise its own judgment. My amendments, then, give the people in whose interest we are concerned, through their legislatures, the option of determining whether they wish to have a prohibition of vinous, malt, and spirituous liquors, or only of spirituous liquors.

I submit that the trend of all recent legislation in Washington, supported by the opinion of the President of the United States, leans to a consideration of the wisdom not of absolute prohibition but of prohibition only relating to distilled and spirituous liquors. That is recognized in the food bill. That is recognized by the Finance Committee in providing for the making of sweet wines, by reducing the rates upon the brandy used in fortification. There seems to be a general understanding that beers and light wines shall not be barred as a war measure, either for the preservation of the people against the abuse of alcohol or for the conservation of food.

That being the spirit of the times, why should not we submit to the legislatures of the States the alternative proposition? Why not give them the privilege, which they so dearly cherish, of deciding these things for themselves? Why pass up to them a hard and fast proposition that "You shall have the prohibition of all liquors, vinous, malt, and distilled, or you shall have a free charter to indulge in vinous, malt, and distilled liquors"—that there shall be no middle ground?

I was just approached by a Senator strongly in favor of prohibition who believes that distilled liquors—and distilled liquors only—are a distinct injury not only to the country in time of war but to the country in time of peace, and that their manufacture consumes valuable foodstuffs. He will favor, however, my amendment. We are in favor of putting a prohibition upon the manufacture of whisky; but the wine of the people, the beer of the people, which has done so much for the Latin countries, which has given perhaps much of the fortitude and valor not only to the French but to the Germans, showing that it can not undermine their ability as fighting men nor undermine their ability in the field of art and letters, in science, and invention, nor diminish, in the least degree their very great and considerable ability, should not be considered in the same category as distilled liquors.

I trust that the Senate will adopt my amendment, which has the support of many, for the reasons stated, and because we conserve the precious rights of the States by giving them the alternative proposition on which to vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I find—as far as I can see, at any rate—that the opposition to the Stone amendment is merely technical, based upon the idea that certain courts have decided that saloons are public nuisances. The States in which those courts acted did not decide that saloons were public nuisances. On the contrary, they had licensed the saloons. It can not be taken for granted that a State would license a public nuisance.

Mr. President, as well as I can size this up, it must come down to the real truth, the real question of honesty between man and man. No man and no number of men, if they were 99,000,000 out of a population of 100,000,000, have a right to take from any other one individual man a piece of property without paying due compensation for it. Men ought to be honest with one another and in their public legislation toward one another.

Everybody knows that as a matter of fact, if we pass this legislation, we are going to take away from a whole lot of people a lot of very valuable property rights. Whether you or I or somebody else agree that they ought ever to have been property rights is another proposition; but they have been property rights, they have been recognized as such, and you have no right—no moral right, no ethical right—to go up and place your hands upon that property and take it without compensation.

I heard an argument this morning from the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] defending the very general proposition of taking slave property from the people of Kentucky and Maryland and Delaware, who had never even seceded, without paying for it. History condemns it, and history always will condemn it. Slave property might have been wrong in principle, but the Constitution had granted it, the laws had granted it; and except where a State had seceded and declared war against the United States Government, and therefore subjected itself to the rights of war rather than the rights of peace, you committed robbery and brigandage and stealing when you took their property without due compensation. It rests as a stain upon your escutcheon until yet.

So far as I am concerned, I never expect to be a candidate for office again, and I do not care what anybody thinks about what I am saying. I am trying to do what I think is right. I repeat, no number of men—I do not care how big the number is—have a right to take from me, as the only one individual in the United States, if I should be the only one, a property right without due compensation.

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] quotes some authority which justifies, or attempts to justify, this robbery upon the ground that the saloon is a public nuisance. It may have been, as a matter of fact, but it was not as a matter of law, because the law had granted the license.

I propose to vote for this constitutional amendment whether the Stone amendment to the amendment goes with it or not. I propose to vote for it for three reasons.

The first is that in doing so I shall represent the State of Mississippi, and I intend to represent her as long as I stand here as one of her Senators. She has uttered her voice in no uncertain tones. I am a State-rights Democrat, and I am going to stand by the State. My primary allegiance is due to the State, and not even to the Federal Government. That perhaps is uttering treason in this body, but at any rate that is the fact so far as I am concerned.

The next thing is that this amendment, if adopted, can do no harm, and it may do a great deal of good. Stamping the liquor traffic out of existence can do nobody any harm. It may lead now and then to the sudden death of a man who has been deprived of his liquor too quickly, but what does that amount to in comparison with the entire American people? It may do immense good.

The third proposition, Mr. President, is that whatever the good may cost, it is worth the money, and not only worth the money in the shape of stamping out the evil, but it is still better worth the money in the way of preserving and maintaining the honor of the United States. If you are going to stamp property out of existence, you ought to pay for it. You have no more right, as a legislator, to vote for a proposition that does that without indemnity than you have a right to take a dollar bill of mine, accidentally left upon this desk, and put it in your pocket.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 4 o'clock has arrived, when, under the unanimous-consent rule, voting must begin on the pending amendment and any amendments that may be offered to the joint resolution. The question before the Senate is the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the following amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. After the last word change the period to a comma and add the following words:

Under such rules of evidence as Congress may provide.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have no right to debate and I do not mean to do it, but I do not think the amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois would change the situation materially as a legislative proposition, and——

Mr. SMOOT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement no speeches can be made.

Mr. STONE. It was not a speech but a statement.

Mr. SMOOT. If we allow it to one we must allow it to another.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am therefore willing to modify my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri accepts the proposed amendment to the amendment. The question is on the amendment as modified. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. STONE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARDWICK. Let the Secretary read the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there a call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. STONE. I asked for the yeas and nays, but some Senator asked to have the amendment read.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will first read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of section 3 as in the joint resolution insert:

SEC. 3. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation; but this article shall not be enforced until the Congress shall have made provision for the ascertainment and payment of damages to the property employed in the manufacture of said liquors resulting from the enforcement of this article, under such rules of evidence as Congress may provide.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator intend to use the language "in lieu of section 3"? As the amendment is drawn it is in lieu of section 3, and there are but two sections in the joint resolution.

Mr. STONE. No; I presented it as a section to be inserted at the proper place.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then the language "in lieu of section 3" should be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A second section has already been added. The yeas and nays are ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS]. Not knowing what his vote on this amendment would be, I am compelled to withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] to the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). On this vote I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SHAFROTH (when Mr. THOMAS's name was called). I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of illness.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained from Chamber by illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]; and

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS—31.

So Mr. STONE's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is still as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. PHELAN. My amendment is on the desk, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will have to be called up if the Senator desires a vote upon it.

Mr. PHELAN. I desire to call it up and ask that it be submitted to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment submitted by the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN].

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert as a substitute:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following two amendments to the Constitution be, and hereby are, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution.

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. The manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, and the exportation thereof from, the United States and all Territories subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited: Provided, That this article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, on or before the 1st day of July, A. D. 1923.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

ARTICLE —.

SECTION 1. The manufacture, sale, or transportation of distilled spirituous liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from, the United States and all Territories subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited: Pro- vided, That this article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, on or before the 1st day of July, A. D. 1923.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

Mr. BORAH. Is an amendment in order to the substitute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would so rule.

Mr. BORAH. I move to strike ou the date "1923" where it appears and insert "1927."

Mr. PHELAN. I have no objection to that modification.

Mr. BORAH. The mover of the proposed amendment accepts the amendment, and the question is on the proposal of the Senator from California as modified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California as modified. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. PHELAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The noes have it and the amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move that the joint resolution be amended by substituting the word "distilled" for the word "intoxicating," in line 10, page 1, so that the article will read as follows:

SECTION 1. The manufacture, sale, or transportation of distilled liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from, the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 10, strike out the word "intoxicating," before the word "liquors," and insert in lieu thereof the word "distilled," so that it will read "manufacture, sale, or transportation of distilled liquors."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of the transfer of my pair as before and vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. Being unable to secure a transfer, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. MARTIN (when the name of Mr. SMITH of Maryland was called). I desire to state that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Chamber by illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I ask that this statement may be considered as applying to all the votes that have been taken and to such votes as may be taken up to the time of adjournment to-day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN].

The result was announced—yeas, 22, nays 57—as follows:

YEAS—22.

Brandegee	Gerry	Lewis	Reed
Broussard	Hardwick	Lodge	Wadsworth
Calder	Hitchcock	Newlands	Warren
Culberson	James	Phelan	Weeks

Colt	Kirby	Saulsbury	Underwood
Cummins	Knox	Shafroth	Vardaman
Curtis	McKellar	Sheppard	Walsh
Fernald	McNary	Sherman	Watson
Fletcher	Martin	Shields	Williams
Gronna	Myers	Simmons	Wolcott
Hale	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Harding	New	Smith, Mich.
Hollis	Norris	Smith, S. C.

NOT VOTING—17.

Dillingham	Hughes	Robinson	Tillman
Fall	Husting	Smith, Ariz.	Townsend
Gallinger	Johnson, S. Dak.	Smith, Md.
Goff	McCumber	Stone
Gore	McLean	Thomas

So Mr. NEWLANDS's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, at the request of Senators who desire to have a record vote I now wish to reserve the right to have a vote on my amendment in the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to reserve a separate vote in the Senate upon what is known as the Harding amendment.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask to have the entire joint resolution read as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the Senator from Texas the joint resolution will be now read as amended.

The Secretary read the joint resolution as amended as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —.

"SECTION 1. The manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

"SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within six years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.

"SEC. 3. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will yield to the Senator from Idaho if he desires to ask a question.

Mr. BORAH. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that this joint resolution provides in one portion of it that the amendment shall be ratified according to the provisions of the Constitution and in another portion provides that it shall be ratified by a vote which shall be had within six years?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That seems to be the construction.

Mr. STONE. The amendment speaks for itself.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] to the language in line 6, of page 1, of the joint resolution providing that the amendment shall "become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution." I think it would be more accurate to say "by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States as provided by the Constitution."

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do.

Mr. REED. I am rising to a point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED. Clearly we can not debate this question now. We have padlocked our own tongues.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am suggesting an amendment. I did not intend to debate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understood.

Mr. REED. I understood the Senator from Connecticut was addressing himself to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not think it was necessary to put my suggestion in the form of an amendment, but I desired to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the matter.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think the language used is sufficiently accurate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is still before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment, the joint resolution will be reported to the Senate as amended.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole, with the exception of the amendment which has been reserved.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if I may do so under the rule, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to strike out "twenty-three" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-seven."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio as reported to the Senate does not contain the word referred to by the Senator from Idaho, the amendment having been amended as in Committee of the Whole. The Secretary will state the amendment as it now stands.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 2. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within six years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.

Mr. BORAH. I move to strike out the words "six years" in the amendment and to insert in lieu thereof the words "ten years."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I raise the point of order that the amendment to which the amendment is offered was not reserved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the Senator from Idaho reserved the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I suppose that the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is subject to discussion, is it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not under the unanimous-consent rule. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho, on which he has asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). Announcing the transfer of my pair as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr ROBINSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Chamber by illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

Mr. BORAH. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. STONE. What is the vote on?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio and adopted as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask a question? Those in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, I understand, vote "yea"?

So the amendment of Mr. HARDING was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I call up the amendment submitted by me, providing for the submission of two amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California offers an amendment. Does the Senator desire it read?

Mr. PHELAN. I was informed by several Senators that they did not understand the proposition, and they requested a record vote. That is my interest in bringing it up at this time. I ask that the Secretary state it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The Secretary read as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following two amendments to the Constitution be, and hereby are, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States, as provided by the Constitution:

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). Announcing the same transfer of my pair as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the negative). I desire to inquire whether the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. CURTIS. I transfer my pair on this question with him to the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Chamber by illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 55, as follows:

So Mr. PHELAN's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is still in the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is, Shall the joint resolution be engrossed and read a third time?

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?—which question must be taken by yeas and nays. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PAGE (when Mr. DILLINGHAM's name was called). My colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is necessarily absent from the Senate. He is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH]. If present and at liberty to vote, my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. FALL's name was called). I have been requested to announce the absence of the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] on account of illness in his family. Were he present, he would vote "yea." Later on I will announce his pair.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). I have been requested to announce that the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is absent on account of illness. Were he present, he would vote "yea." Later on I will announce his pair.

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. GOFF's name was called). I have been requested to announce the absence of the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] on account of illness. Were he present he would vote "yea." I will announce his pair later.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. In view of the announcement made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] I feel at liberty to vote. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], but I am informed that a transfer has been made, so that the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] and the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] may stand paired with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN]. That leaves me at liberty to vote on the final passage of the joint resolution. I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] who, if present, I understand would vote "nay." I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], each of whom I understand if present would vote "yea," giving a pair of "yeas" to one "nay," which leaves me at liberty to vote. I therefore vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. Being advised that if he were present he would vote "yea," I feel at liberty to vote, and I do so. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHAFROTH (when Mr. THOMAS's name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. THOMAS] on account of sickness and to say that he is paired with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN] on this question, and that if present my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). Making the same announcement as on the previous vote, I desire to say that if my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] were present he would vote "yea."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who would vote "yea" if present, are paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; and that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON], who would vote "yea" if present, are paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to state that the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Chamber by illness. He is paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

The result was announced—yeas 65, nays 20, as follows:

YEAS—65.

Ashurst	Johnson, Cal.	Newlands	Smith, Mich.
Bankhead	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Smith, S. C.

Gallinger	Johnson, S. Dak.	Thomas

So the joint resolution was passed, two-thirds of the Senators present voting therefor.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present a conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator from Florida if the report has been printed.

Mr. FLETCHER. It has not been printed.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator think it ought to go over and be printed and be taken up at the next meeting of the Senate? No one knows what is in it. I think that course is due to the Senate. The report is just submitted. No Senators, except the three conferees, know what changes have been made, and it is a bill of quite considerable importance. I do not know that there will be any ojection to the report, but we at least ought to know what the changes are. I ask the Senator to let it go over and be printed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will state that there were not a great many matters in conference, and it is not a very complicated report. I think it could be thoroughly understood from the reading of it. I do not know of any rule which requires a conference report to go over until the next day. If, however, Senators would prefer that course, I do not want to stand in the way of it. In that case I shall call it up the first thing to-morrow.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Senator to let it go over. I know that the Senator might immediately have a vote upon it in the Senate, but there is hardly ever a time when there is a request made that a conference report shall go over and be printed that it is refused. I will say to the Senator I do not think there is any disposition whatever to fight the report in any way, but at least we ought to know what it contains.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well, then, Mr. President, I present it now and ask to have it printed, although I do not see any reason why we should not lay it aside temporarily. Would the Senator object to that?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think the Senator will make any time by doing that. Perhaps there will not be a word said when the report is read, but I do believe that we ought to know what it contains. I ask the Senator to let it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. KENYON. Has it been printed in the RECORD?

Mr. FLETCHER. It has not. I am just presenting it now.

Mr. KENYON. I ask the Senator to let it go over until to-morrow and that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Florida withdraw the motion for the consideration of the conference report?

Mr. FLETCHER. I merely present the report now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I give notice that I shall ask for its consideration to-morrow.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I submit a motion that the Senate Committee on Woman Suffrage be discharged from the further consideration of S. J. Res. 2, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States conferring upon women the right of suffrage, now before that committee, and that the same be placed on the calendar of the Senate. I ask that the motion may lie over under the rule, and I shall call it up to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be received.

ENLISTMENT OF ALIEN RESIDENTS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate resolution 108. I understand from the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] that there will be no objection to it on his part, and I think it can be passed immediately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of Senate resolution 108, reported on the 30th of July by Mr. McCUMBER from the Committee on Foreign Relations, looking to the enlistment of certain alien residents in the Army of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the preamble.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That may be done by the Senator having charge of the resolution, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, in order to conform the resolution to the proper reading I move to amend, on page 2, line 3, by striking out the word "said" and inserting, after "central powers," the words "of Europe." The word "said" refers to the preamble, and it merely makes the sentence complete.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 3, strike out the word "said" before the word "central," and after the word "powers" insert the word "of Europe," so as to read "engaged in war against the central powers of Europe."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The question is on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from North Dakota correctly stated my attitude with reference to the matter. I do not see any conflict between this resolution and the joint resolution proposed by me. I shall later call up that joint resolution and ask for its consideration, but not this afternoon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to propose to all European nations engaged in war against the central powers of Europe and, if possible, secure from them an agreement authorizing and empowering the United States to apply the provisions of the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, to all such subjects and citizens domiciled in this country in the same manner and to the same effect as such provisions are applied to the citizens of the United States in selecting and raising an army or navy for service in the present war.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to have inserted in the RECORD what appears to be in the nature of a petition from the Bohemian National Alliance. I agree with everything in the petition with the exception of that portion of the petition which calls for the enlistment of alien enemies. In other respects I think it is very pertinent, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOHEMIAN (CZECH) NATIONAL ALLIANCE OF AMERICA,
Chicago, Ill., July 27, 1917.

Senator PORTER J. McCUMBER,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: As one of the members of the subcommittee of the Senate to determine the liability of aliens to military service, you may be interested in learning the attitude of people of Bohemian birth.

There can not be two opinions on the question of the duty of resident aliens to fight for the country in which they make their living. The alien enjoys all the rights of the citizen—the right of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. He is protected by our laws; he is given opportunity not merely to make a better living than in his native land but to earn wealth he never dreamed of. The only right withheld from the alien resident is the right to vote, although even that is granted him in some States.

All the rules of square deal, all the obligations of gratitude, demand that when the country is in danger all residents, citizens and aliens alike, should offer their lives in its defense. We feel confident, sir, that the overwhelming majority of people of foreign birth residing in the United States will heartily approve as just any measure Congress may enact to make the obligations of citizens and resident aliens equal in the matter of military duty.

Speaking for our entire membership of 120,000; in fact, speaking for all residents of this country who are of Bohemian birth, whether naturalized or not, we urge you, sir, and all the Members of Congress so to amend our laws as to make all residents of the United States equally liable to service in the National Army.

We of Bohemia have a special interest in seeing a measure of this kind enacted promptly, for we are being discriminated against by the Department of War. After several thousand of our young men had been accepted for service in the Regular Army, a large proportion of whom took out their first papers solely so as to become eligible for enlistment, we were notified by The Adjutant General that Bohemian boys could serve only if fully naturalized, for "it is not the policy to permit the enlistment in the Army of any person who may be legitimately claimed as subject by an enemy country or by a country allied with an enemy country."

The motive of the War Department was very praiseworthy—not to accept the volunteer services of men who, if captured by the enemy, would probably be denied the rights of prisoners of war. Not that our men would let that consideration overbalance the privilege of fighting the Germans. The Czecho-Slovak brigade in Russia, composed of Bohemian (Czech) and Slovak prisoners of war, fought the more bravely and covered themselves with glory, since they well knew that they could expect no mercy in case of capture.

But the humanitarian objection of the War Department will be eliminated if Congress makes it the duty of all resident aliens, Czechs and others still claimed as subjects by Austria-Hungary, to fight in defense of the country wherein they made their homes.

We are, sir, most respectfully, yours, for the BOHEMIAN NATIONAL ALLIANCE OF AMERICA,
L. J. FISHER, President.
J. F. SMETANKA, Secretary.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2477) to authorize the construction of a building for the use of the Treasury Department.

Mr. KING. I object to its consideration.

Mr. SWANSON. I made a motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. KING. I thought he was asking unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

On a division the motion was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 2695) to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across Little River, at or near the foot of the gar hole about one-half mile south of the Jonesboro, Lake City & Eastern Railway bridge across Little River, Ark., and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate certain telegrams addressed to the Vice President of the United States, which will be noted in the RECORD.

Telegrams from the Wisconsin State Federation of Labor; from the National Bottle Manufacturers' Association and the Glass Bottle Blowers' Association in convention at Atlantic City, N. J.; from the Pennsylvania Grains and Feed Co., of Philadelphia, Pa.; and from Local No. 15 of the Glass Bottle Blowers' Association, of Milwaukee, Wis., remonstrating against national prohibition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The telegrams will lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of California, praying for the establishment of a moral zone around the concentration camps of the Army, which was ordered to lie on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas will state it.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yesterday at the close of my address on the prohibition amendment I asked permission of the Senate to insert a number of letters in the RECORD as a part of my remarks, with the understanding that the letters should not contain anything that reflected against any Senator or Member of the House. It is my earnest desire and intention to adhere strictly to that requirement, and it was my wish to personally read all the letters before they went to the printer. I did so as far as I was physically able to do it, and instructed my clerks to read the balance, and to eliminate everything that was objectionable, but in the rush of things, which all Senators will understand, a number of the letters slipped in which contain some reference to and reflection upon the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

These letters were written, Mr. President, at a time when we had a little controversy when this matter was up a few months ago, and reference to that incident was made in some of the letters. Some of the statements in the letters were unjust and unwarranted, and statements that I did not approve, and do not now approve of, and I believe they were made under an entire misunderstanding of the facts.

I have known the Senator from Missouri favorably and well for a quarter of a century. I have never had any trouble with him in the world, and I surely have no desire nor intention to do him any wrong or injury among the people of my State or elsewhere.

I regret that the mistake occurred, and I was surprised this morning to see any letters containing any objectionable matter, which I had supposed was all eliminated. To show my good faith I went immediately to the clerk, Mr. Moxley, who has charge of such matters, and arranged for the elimination of those statements in the letters, and I also expressed my regret that the mistake occurred to the junior Senator from Missouri, as I do now to the Senate. I ask unanimous consent that all objectionable statements having reference to the junior Senator from Missouri be expunged from the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection the matter referred to will be expunged from the permanent RECORD.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 22 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, August 2, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, August 1, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God, Almighty, creator, upholder, and sustainer of all, rich are the endowments of life, strange are its vicissitudes. We know not how or whither; but we pray for faith to uphold us, light to guide us, and the willingness to do the right, as it is given us to see the right, that we may go about our Father's business this day and all subsequent days in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. RANSDELL, and Mr. NELSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2695. An act to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across Little River, at or near the foot of the gar hole about one-half mile south of the Jonesboro, Lake City & Eastern Railway bridge across Little River, Ark.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 3331. An act for the protection of desert-land entrymen who enter the military or naval service of the United States in time of war.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following personal request, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

JULY 30, 1917.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby request an indefinite leave of absence on account of sickness in my family.

Your friend, CLARENCE F. LEA.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

ENLISTMENT OF ALIENS.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to address the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced in the House, the Chamberlain bill to conscript aliens, and at this time I desire to submit a few reasons why this bill should be immediately passed.

In the first place, the alien who comes to this country comes here for the purpose of improving his condition, and if he did not improve it he would not stay, but would return to his native land. He enjoys the privilege of our high wages, the protection of our laws, the freedom of all our institutions, and all the liberties of an American citizen, save only the right to vote. This right is not exercised by many native-born citizens. He owes an obligation to the Government that extends to him this privilege. He owes the Government the obligation to protect it in the hour of danger. If he came here with good intentions he should apply for citizenship and should be willing to protect the Government that gave him an asylum.

It is the unanimous sentiment of every American citizen in this country that if we gain nothing else from this war we should Americanize America.

In New York the registered aliens are over 20 per cent of the registration, in Pennsylvania it is 25 per cent of the registration, in New Jersey it is about 35 per cent of the registration, in Massachusetts it is over 30 per cent of the registration, in Connecticut it is 30 per cent, and in Arizona it is about 40 per cent of the registration. Just think of it, these States have to furnish their quota in accordance with the registration, and the loyal citizen must do the fighting for these aliens, while the alien is sitting around waiting for the loyal American to go to the front and he will take his job. It is up to this Congress to stop this farce, and make Mr. Alien come to the rescue of this country that has been his benefactor and protector.

This country must do something to make these aliens either become American citizens or else after a reasonable time return to their native land.

This registration indicates that this has become a serious problem. We must Americanize these aliens or they will un-Americanize us.

There are in this country 1,275,902 aliens who are not alien enemies, and only 80,538 who registered as alien enemies. Of course, we must consider the treaty rights of these aliens, but I believe we should make it for their interests to become citizens. Under this conscription law we encourage aliens not to become citizens. We place a premium upon noncitizenship and a penalty upon citizenship. I believe, on the other hand, that every alien who enlists in the United States Army should become a citizen when honorably discharged without any other formality. We must encourage aliens to become citizens in every way possible. We could forbid the employment of aliens in certain occupations, and I believe we should do it during this war. There is one thing sure, we must either draft these aliens or else not figure them in making up the quota of the different districts.

The people of this country do not take kindly to the exemption of these aliens, and I want to give you some figures from a few precincts in my own city of Cleveland, Ohio.

Ward 7, precinct E, American 125, alien 379.
Ward 9, precinct H, American 65, alien 262.
Ward 10, precinct A, American 194, alien 431.
Ward 12, precinct E, American 162, alien 313.
Ward 12, precinct F, American 59, alien 272.
Ward 23, precinct A, American 73, alien 342.
Ward 26, precinct H, American 148, alien 333.

These are appalling figures and show the actual conditions. Some of these precincts are 3 to 1 alien, and the American boy has three chances to one that he will go over the boy in an all-American district.

This is an outrage upon the young men of this country, and we must do something to protect him. We must not give the alien the advantage over the brave American boy who gives up his position, gives up his peaceful home, gives up perhaps his wife, and goes to a foreign land to fight for his country's honor. Congress would be negligent in its duty to the young men of this country if it did not right this great wrong.

Let us pass this alien conscription bill; right the wrong that has been done. Many a mother's heart will bleed as she sees her boy march away. Let us not give the alien the opportunity to sit by and laugh. Mr. Alien either should become a citizen, enlist, be drafted, or go back home. This country has been an asylum for the oppressed. Let it not become a rendezvous for traitors, ingrates, criminals, and outcasts.

Many of these aliens would not fight for their own country and came here to avoid military service and to avoid serving their own country. Let us not encourage them in this disloyalty. Let us say to the alien you may come here, we welcome you to our land of freedom and opportunity, but you owe this country an obligation, and this obligation is to help defend it in the hour of its crisis. [Applause.]

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 2, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee that Thy purpose in us as a Nation has been revealed by the far-seeing vision of those who laid the foundations of our national life. We bless Thee that in our day there are still those who look into the coming years and anticipate something of the struggles, the trials, and the opportunities that are presented to us as a Nation and are faithfully and bravely facing them. Grant, we pray, that Thou wilt lead us on, ever giving to us a vision of the larger life, and ever calling upon us to fulfill the divine purpose. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Tuesday, July 31, 1917, when, on request of Mr. BRADY and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

SUGGESTED PEACE BASIS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a dispatch from a number of citizens, with an inclosure, which I desire to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

JULY 29, 1917.

Hon. WILLIAM J. STONE,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR STONE: Some of the recent discussions in the Senate prompt us to ask you, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, to introduce a concurrent resolution in the Senate which would enable Congress to state its conception of the proper basis for peace negotiations. We are submitting a purely tentative draft of such a resolution. Our reasons for urging immediate action are these:

It can hardly be denied that the German peace resolution, carried in the Reichstag on July 19 by a vote of 214 to 116, is an attempt on the part of the German people to express their willingness to enter into peace negotiations on the basis of "no annexations and no indemnities." The express language of the resolution leaves no room for doubt:

"The Reichstag labors for peace and a mutual understanding and lasting reconciliation among the nations. Forced acquisitions of territory and political, economic, and financial violations are incompatible with such a peace."

The Reichstag, though not, in the democratic sense, a truly representative body, is, nevertheless, the only political body through which the German people can speak to the rest of the world. Through it they have spoken by an overwhelming majority and in unmistakable terms, disclaiming conquest and indemnities, claiming only their national integrity, professing their desire to join in an international organization for a lasting world peace. To ignore this resolution is to prove all our protestations of friendship for the German people false.

If we genuinely desire to strengthen the hand of the German people against autocracy, this is our opportunity; we must receive the Reichstag resolution with official respect and ignore the speech of the chancellor who is responsible only to the Kaiser.

We urge action by congressional resolution in this matter, because we believe it is high time for the parliament of the world to take a hand in the business of making peace. Continually called upon to approve war policies and vote war appropriations, the peoples' representatives, with the exception of Russia and now Germany, have not declared their terms of peace.

Respectfully, yours,

AMOS PINCHOT,	ALICE LEWISOHN,
LILLIAN D. WALD,	NORMAN M. THOMAS,
L. HOLLINGSWORTH WOOD,	CHARLES T. HALLINAN,
MAX EASTMAN,	JOHN L. ELLIOTT,
JOHN HAYNES HOLMES,	CRYSTAL EASTMAN,
ROGER N. BALDWIN,

For the American Union Against Militarism.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, just a word. This communication comes to me in an official way as the chairman of one of the committees of the Senate. As it comes from citizens of undoubted respectable character and responsibility, I have thought proper to submit it to the Senate. I make no observation upon it at this time. I have had it read and ask that it may lie upon the table, for I desire to make some observations respecting the communication at an early and convenient day. I am not prepared to proceed this morning. I shall hope during the coming week to find an opportunity to say something with respect to the request of these ladies and gentlemen, and with respect to the subject about which they ask me in my official capacity to take some action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CALDER. I ask to have printed in the RECORD a petition of colored people of the city of New York, praying for the redress of certain grievances.

There being no objection, the petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the President and the Congress of the United States:

We, the committee of the negro silent-protest parade, representing the colored people of Greater New York and the sentiment of the people of negro descent throughout this land, come to you to present a petition for redress of grievances.

In the last 31 years 2,867 colored men and women have been lynched by mobs without trial. Less than a half dozen persons out of the tens of thousands involved have received any punishment whatsoever for these crimes, and not a single one has been punished for murder. In addition to this, mobs have harried and murdered colored citizens time and time again with impunity, culminating in the latest atrocity at East St. Louis, where nearly a hundred innocent, hard-working citizens were done to death in broad daylight for seeking to earn an honest living.

We believe that this spirit of lawlessness is doing untold injury to our country, and we submit that the record proves that the States are either unwilling or unable to put down lynching and mob violence.

We ask, therefore, that lynching and mob violence be made a national crime punishable by the laws of the United States, and that this be done by Federal enactment or, if necessary, by constitutional amendment. We believe that there can be found in recent legislation abundant precedent for action of this sort, and whether this be true or not, no nation that seeks to fight the battles of civilization can afford to march in blood-smeared garments.

We ask, therefore, immediate action by the Congress and the President of the United States.

Dated New York, July 28, 1917.

Frederick Asbury Cullen; James W. Johnson; John E. Vail; Everard W. Daniel; George Frazier Miller; Charles Douglas Martin; D. Insin Hoage; A. Clayton Powell, pastor Abyssinian Baptist Church; William P. Hayes, D. D., pastor Mount Olivet Baptist Church; Fred R. Moore; Alfred B. Cooley; Isaac B. Allen; Maria C. Lawton; Sarah Walker.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a petition of the Auxiliary of the Woman's Missionary Society of the Methodist Church of Miami, Tex., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of Phœnix Lodge, No. 4, Knights of Pythias, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to fix the compensation of certain employees of the Government, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask to have read a telegram which I send to the desk, after which I desire that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the telegram, as follows:

MARENGO, ILL., July 29, 1917.

Hon. GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Millions of bushels of grain are falling on ground to rot throughout the corn belt for lack of manual labor, unobtainable at any price. This is discouraging farmers and will result in enormous reduction of 1918 acreage. Unless relief is assured, farmers will not again sow what they can not reap. Strenuous effort should immediately be made to exempt all farm laborers from draft. Situation is critical.

WM. STULL.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to state that the author of the telegram is a man of prominence and a very large landowner, who is probably well acquainted with the facts that he states. I think, however, that his fears are somewhat unnecessary, as the various tribunals having charge of exemptions under the draft are empowered to exempt men who are needed in agricultural pursuits.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The telegram will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. POINDEXTER subsequently said: In connection with the telegram that was handed up a moment ago by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], indicating the inability of farmers to obtain farm labor at any price, as the telegram says, I should like to have the Secretary read a statement which I have just received from the Chamber of Commerce of the City of Bellingham, in the State of Washington, pointing out the great number of idle men in certain organizations who apparently are making a business of encouraging idleness on the part of the able-bodied young men of the country. I ask that it be read in that connection, because it deals with a situation that is growing serious throughout the Pacific coast region.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolutions.

Whereas there is an undue amount of industrial troubles; and
Whereas statistics show that there is a permanent approximate average of 2,000,000 young men in idleness; and
Whereas the continuous agitation on the part of some of these idle men is dangerous to the lives and property of our citizens and inimicable to the welfare of our Nation; and
Whereas the doctrines preached by certain bands or societies of these idle parasites are directly opposed to the principles on which our Nation is founded and threaten the very existence of our industries and free institutions: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Chamber of Commerce of Bellingham urges the need of national legislation along the following lines:

1. That a census of labor be taken and a system of industrial conscription be put in force for the duration of the war.

2. That criminal syndicalism, which may be defined as advocating crime, sabotage, violence, and other unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing industrial or political reform, be prohibited in every form under heavy penalty; and be it

Resolved further, That a copy of this statement and these resolutions be sent to the President, Secretary of Labor, Senators and Representatives of Washington, United States Chamber of Commerce, and commercial organizations of the Pacific coast and the large centers of population with a request for immediate action and cooperation.

CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF BELLINGHAM,
C. A. SHORT, President,
P. E. MAGRUDER, Executive Secretary.

Mr. WARREN. I ask to have the following telegram printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance. It is signed by A. E. Roedel, president of the Wyoming Pharmaceutical Association.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHEYENNE, WYO., July 21, 1917.

Hon. F. E. WARREN,
Washington, D. C.:

On behalf of the pharmaceutical association, I wish to enter objection to paragraphs 19 and 20, section 304, of the revenue bill, which reads, "Whether in original condition or mixed and combined with any other article." If this is enacted as it stands, it will entail a tremendous hardship on the druggists of this country, as it would include all tinctures, fluid extracts, elixirs, and many other pharmaceutical preparations; also perfumes, toilet waters, hair tonics, and various other toilet articles. Have no objections to the provisions as applied to alcohol itself, or where the denaturization was such that it still could be used as a beverage.

A. E. ROEDEL,
President Wyoming Pharmaceutical Association.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2334) to authorize absence by homestead settlers and entrymen, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 96) thereon.

Mr. SWANSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 82. A bill to transfer Frederick W. Cobb from the list of chief machinists, United States Navy, to the list of chief pay clerks, United States Navy (Rept. No. 98); and

S. 2617. A bill authorizing the restoration of John T. Melvin, a lieutenant (junior grade), to the active list of the Navy (Rept. No. 97).

Mr. PHELAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2437) to provide for the acquisition of an air-station site for the United States Navy, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 99) thereon.

LEASE OF PHOSPHATE LANDS.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have a report on behalf of the Committee on Public Lands, and it is the desire of the committee that present consideration of the bill be had. I understand that important matters are to follow it, but I am satisfied the bill will not create any debate.

It is a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to enter into leases of certain potash lands in the United States for the purpose of increasing the potash supply. I think every Senator here realizes the condition of the potash supply in the United States. We had been using, up to the time of the war, some 400,000 tons of potash in this country annually, and all except ten or fifteen thousand tons came from Germany. That supply is absolutely cut off at the present time; and not only cut off, but the German chancellor took occasion to state that the United States had gone into this war with a noose around its neck because it did not have the means to supply the foodstuffs necessary for its people without potash, and the potash position is deplorable.

The bill I am presenting on behalf of the Committee on Public Lands has been a part of the general leasing bill or a part of the so-called oil bill. That bill passed the House twice and this body once. There were violent objections to the provisions of the bill concerning oil, but there never has been any objection concerning the provisions of the bill——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, is the Senator going to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think until that has been obtained the Senator had better not occupy the floor.

Mr. PITTMAN. I recognize the Senator's right to make that objection. I expected that I would be asked questions regarding the bill, and I thought I would explain it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objection to the Senator explaining it at length after the bill has been presented.

Mr. PITTMAN. I was about through with the explanation.

Mr. SMOOT. My duty upon the Finance Committee has been such that I could not attend the meeting of the Public Lands Committee. I wish to ask the Senator if the bill applies to only the Searles Lake potash lands, or does it apply to all the potash lands of the United States?

Mr. PITTMAN. The particular provisions which the Senator has in mind are leasing provisions and are general in the bill.

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope the Senator will not make the request until the morning business has been disposed of.

Mr. PITTMAN. This is a report of a committee.

Mr. HARDWICK. I know; but the Senator wants to have the bill considered.

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall submit the report and make the request.

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope the Senator will not do that until morning business is over.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is evident that the Senator from Georgia is going to object.

Mr. HARDWICK. I hope the Senator will not make that request until we get through with the routine morning business.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator to make the report and have it printed, and then let it go over.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly.

Mr. PITTMAN. Of course I shall have to do that. It will be necessary to do that if there is going to be objection. I want to give notice at the present time that this matter is of such vital importance that I am going to move to take it up. I think the Senator from Utah understands the importance of the question of potash in this country.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada a question. As I understand, this measure does not in the least affect the Naval Reserve?

Mr. PITTMAN. It has nothing to do with anything except potash; and has nothing to do with the Naval Reserve.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope the Senator from Nevada will make his motion to take up this bill to-morrow and that the Senate will back him in it, and give the bill immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada makes a report from the Committee on Public Lands, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reports favorably, with certain amendments, the bill (S. 2156) to authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium or sodium, and submits a report (No. 100) thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

A bill (S. 2730) granting an increase of pension to Charles Thomas (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 2731) granting an increase of pension to John M. Anderson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 2732) granting an increase of pension to George H. Ross (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 88) amending Article V of the Constitution of the United States by providing that, to be effective, amendments to the Constitution shall be ratified within six years; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SAN ANTONIO ARSENAL, TEX.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 2716) making appropriations for improvements of San Antonio Arsenal, San Antonio, Tex.; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, unless the Senator from Texas desires that the bill, which proposes to make appropriations for fortifications, shall go to the Committee on Military Affairs, I wish to suggest that it properly belongs to the Committee on Appropriations, as a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations has charge of the matter of making appropriations for fortifications. We have had that very question before our committee. I therefore suggest to the Senator from Texas that the bill ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations rather than to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I had intended to call the attention of the Chair to that fact, and I now suggest that the bill be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

INTRODUCTION OF PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I notice that a good deal of time is taken up during the morning hour in the introduction of private bills. I understand there has been adopted by the Senate a modified rule permitting private bills to be handed in at the desk or to be given to the Secretary. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] indicates that that is the rule. I therefore suggest to Senators who are unacquainted with the rule that any private bills which they may desire to introduce should be sent to the desk instead of being presented from the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from Arizona that the rule to which he refers permits, but does not require, the presentation of such bills at the Secretary's desk.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 4285, being the river and harbor bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Chair if the morning business has been concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business has not yet closed.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the motion of the Senator from Florida had better be withheld until morning business shall have been concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is in order to take up the matter for which I ask consideration at any time, and I think it ought to be taken up now.

Mr. SMOOT. The rule provides for the presentation of a conference report at any time, but not for its consideration.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it can be considered at any time.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I think the proper way would be to wait until morning business has been concluded, and then move to take up the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Florida to make his motion as soon as possible, as the Chair thinks it is in the nature of a preferred motion.

Mr. FLETCHER. Very well.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, on yesterday I filed a motion to discharge the Committee on Woman Suffrage from the further consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 2. I desire to call up the motion at this time, because it is in itself a report of a committee or at least has to do with the work of a committee.

Mr. HARDWICK. I rise to a question of order, that during morning business when purely perfunctory reports are being submitted, it is not in order to move to discharge a committee from the consideration of a matter which is before it; that this is not the proper time to make such a motion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not sure whether or not this is a proper time to get up the matter. I am quite willing to take the suggestion or direction of the Chair upon that point, and if it is proper to wait until we have passed through the——

Mr. HARDWICK. Routine morning business.

Mr. CUMMINS. The routine of morning business, I am quite willing to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order has been called for.

Mr. HARDWICK. Regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must continue the call of the morning business. Reports of committees are still in order. If there be none, the introduction of bills and joint resolutions is in order.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask whether the motion to which I referred a moment ago is a part of the morning business; that is, is it the equivalent of a resolution coming over from a previous day?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule a motion similar to the one submitted by the Senator from Iowa lies over for one day——

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no disposition to interfere with the presentation of morning business, of course, but I do not want to lose the opportunity to present my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is quite clear about the matter. If the Senator from Iowa desires to call up his motion, which is practically a resolution coming over from a previous day, he will be privileged to do it immediately after the call for concurrent and other resolutions.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no concurrent or other resolutions, morning business is closed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I now call up the motion to which I have referred and desire to submit it to the Senate with a very few observations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the clause of Rule VIII which provides that motions before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate, thinking that that applies to the motion of the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, do I understand the Chair to rule that I can not call up the resolution as a matter of right?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not think so.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. Then I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the motion to discharge the Committee on Woman Suffrage from the further consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a motion or resolution coming over from a previous day.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word with regard to the ruling of the Chair. I can not think we quite understand each other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be very glad to have the Senator refer him to any rule on the subject.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Chair upon a former occasion ruled, as I remember, that a resolution—and this is the equivalent of a resolution—that goes over under the rule does not come up automatically, but must be called up at the close of the routine morning business. I do not think, however, that it has ever been held that a resolution of that kind during the morning hour must be taken up by a vote, nor do I think it has ever been held that a resolution of that kind during the morning hour is not debatable. The morning hour is the only opportunity for the consideration of a resolution or motion of the character I have presented, and if it can not be taken up during that time, and can not be debated during that time, there never would be any chance to consider it unless it were desirable to displace the unfinished business, which would come on after the morning hour had expired, at 2 o'clock.

I hope that the Chair upon reflection will modify his ruling, so that the motion may come up by right and so that those who are interested in it may be permitted to debate it within the morning hour. Of course, if the morning hour should expire during the pendency of the motion, it would go over automatically.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah desire to address the Chair?

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say just a word, Mr. President. I call the attention of the Chair to Rule XXVI, paragraph 2, which reads:

> 2. All reports of committees and motions to discharge a committee from the consideration of the subject, and all subjects from which a committee shall be discharged, shall lie over one day for consideration, unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct.

Yesterday the Senator from Iowa offered this motion. It went over under the rule one day. It is a resolution in every sense of the word. It comes up automatically; it has a right to come up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will permit the Chair, it has been otherwise decided.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to call the attention of the President pro tempore to the fact that the Chair decided that a Senator offering a resolution must, if he desires the resolution considered, call it up, and as soon as the Senator who offered the resolution rises in his place in the Senate and asks that the resolution be called up, then it has a right to be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Can the Senator refer the Chair to any such rule?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not looked it up, but I am quite sure I am right, and that that has been the ruling of Vice President MARSHALL on that very point. Not only that, Mr. President, but it has been the practice of the Senate that when any resolution that goes over for a day is called up it has always been debated as long as the morning hour lasts, if it took that time to dispose of it, and if it were not disposed of at the end of the morning hour, then it went to the calendar. That is exactly the course which the resolution of the Senator from Iowa ought to take.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wanted to suggest at that point, if the Senator would permit me, that in the enumerated articles which constitute the morning business resolutions coming over from the previous day have their place as a matter of right.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And when the Senator who has had one coming over from a previous day calls it up it must be laid before the Senate, in my opinion, just as much as any article enumerated as proper for the morning hour.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and I will say to the President pro tempore that that was the ruling of the Vice President, and it came about in this way: A resolution would be offered, and perhaps the Senator offering the resolution would not be ready to speak upon it on the following day, and day after day he asked that it go over without prejudice; and the ruling of the Chair was, after the question arose, that unless the resolution was called up by the Senator offering it, it would go over without prejudice and could be called up at any time that he might request.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that in the last Congress there was a bill called the general leasing bill, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining, and there was a motion to discharge the committee and refer it to the Committee on Public Lands; and it was discussed here, and I think this very point was raised. Now, I do not think it would be fair to vote upon a measure without giving the committee an opportunity to state their position. For that reason it seems to me that there ought to be some discussion, not necessarily at any length; but it seems to me the rule should follow that precedent of the Senate, that really has been the practice for some time, of letting discussion be had upon a motion to discharge a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has evidently misapprehended the motion. The motion which the Chair was entertaining was a motion to take up, when consideration will be had.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I find this statement on page 12 of the Rules and Manual of the Senate:

> All motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this motion was not made——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico now has the floor. To whom does he yield, if to anyone?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I suggest to the Senator from New Mexico that this motion was not made before 2 o'clock. The motion was made yesterday, and under the rules it was laid over until to-day. It is not in the category of a motion made during the morning hour. If the Chair rules that the only way in which we can reach the matter is to make a motion to proceed to its consideration, then that would be a motion made in the morning hour, and I agree it would not be debatable; but I insist that it comes up upon the suggestion of the mover of the resolution, as a matter of right, for disposition in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that in the interest of the progress of business in the Senate he proposes to leave this question, which seems to be considered from diverse points of view, to the decision of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from New Mexico. I thought he had finished what he wanted to say. Had he not?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I had not quite finished, Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Especially in view of what the Chair has just announced, I think it is not improper for me to make just one further remark that I intended to make, and that is in answer to what the Senator from Iowa has just said.

Under Rule XXVI, referred to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], in the second division of that rule, I find this statement:

All reports of committees and motions to discharge a committee from the consideration of the subject, and all subjects from which a committee shall be discharged, shall lie over one day for consideration, unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct.

Now, Mr. President, as I interpret that rule, it simply means that these matters shall go over one day unless by unanimous consent they are considered on the same day; but I do not understand that on the second day they occupy any privileged position before the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. They simply stand as other matters upon the calendar which may be considered by the Senate upon that second day——

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. And in order to bring them up for consideration, it is necessary, then, to make a motion to bring up the matter on the second day, and, if within the morning hour, it must be decided without debate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to any one; and if so, to whom?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I want to call his attention to the ruling of the Vice President on that very question, because I want to see if the Senator does not admit his error after he listens to this ruling. The Vice President ruled on February 18, 1915, as follows:

If the Senate will permit the Chair to make a statement about this matter, the view of the Chair will be made plain to the Senate.

It has always been the custom since the Chair has been here that after the order of concurrent and other resolutions the Chair has laid before the Senate resolutions coming over from a preceding day; but upon investigation of the rules it appears that there is nothing in the rules which requires the Chair to do any such thing. Resolutions are provided for in clause 5 of Rule XIV:

"All resolutions shall lie over one day for consideration, unless by unanimous consent the Senate shall otherwise direct."

While the Chair believes that it would be to the interest of the orderly transaction of business for the Chair to lay down resolutions as they come over from a preceding day, the Chair thinks it is the duty of a Senator who has introduced a resolution which has gone over one day for consideration, at the time when concurrent and other resolutions are called for, to call up his resolution—

That is just what the Senator from Iowa has done.

He has a right to call it up and to have it either considered or referred to a committee, but it is not, under the rules of the Senate, the unqualified duty of the Chair to lay it down.

Now, the Senator from Iowa has made no motion to proceed to the consideration of this matter as though it were a bill on the calendar.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I understand that he has.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. He has a right to call it up. He has called it up, and it is debatable until 2 o'clock.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senate will allow the Chair, in connection with the statement made by the Senator from Connecticut, an examination of Rule VIII will disclose the fact that in the order of procedure, resolutions coming over from a previous day are not called for, but on the conclusion of concurrent and other resolutions the calendar is the next order of business, which reinforces the views of the Vice President to the point where it is stated that the Senator had a right to have the bill called up.

The present occupant of the chair is not aware of any rule which would support the idea of a motion coming up on a matter and thought that the second provision referred to—that a motion made before 2 o'clock should be determined without debate—applies to this question. The Chair, however, in view of the divergence of opinion among Senators, desires to leave this question for the determination of the Senate, which will conclude the matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in order that the question of whether I have a right under the rules to call up the motion filed yesterday can be laid before the Senate, I withdraw the motion to proceed to the consideration of the motion and insist upon my right under the rules to call it up and ask for its consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair leaves to the Senate the question of whether the Senator has that right, as a point of order.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri will state it.

Mr. STONE. If the Senate proceeds in any form at this time to determine this question it must be determined without debate, must it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Well, let me finish.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. The Chair thinks so, and I am inclined to agree with the Chair. But after 2 o'clock the motion to proceed would be open to debate? I am asking the Chair.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Wait a moment; I have the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. I was going to ask the Senator to yield in order that I might read two decisions on the subject, if he had no objection.

Mr. STONE. I am trying to state a parliamentary inquiry, a part of which I have stated, and the Chair has answered that if we proceed now, before 2 o'clock, to the consideration of this question as presented, whatever we may do must be done without debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator misunderstood the Chair. The Chair made no such decision as that.

Mr. STONE. Well, what is the judgment of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course Senators recognize the fact that they may ask many questions which the Chair is not prepared to determine without reference to the rules or to the precedents. You can not proceed to the consideration of a matter and then have no consideration or debate upon it. That is not the question now before the Senate. The Chair would be very glad to have any Senator submit any precedent on this matter with which he is familiar.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to call the Chair's attention to a precedent.

Mr. STONE. Well, I do not see how the Senator takes me off the floor summarily until the Chair sits me down.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. STONE. Before the time when the matter goes to the calendar, before the morning hour is over, you can not move to take up a question and then debate it. It is not subject to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is asking, in some respects, a moot question.

Mr. STONE. I am not asking a moot question. I am asking a question that relates to the thing we have before us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator will consult the second paragraph of Rule VIII, he will find that debate is not allowed upon a motion to take up; but that is not this question. The Chair is endeavoring to submit to the Senate a point of order as to the right of a Senator to call up a resolution.

Mr. STONE. Well, the main question I want to ask the Chair is this: After 2 o'clock, if the Senator from Iowa should move to discharge the committee and proceed to the consideration of the constitutional amendment, that would be in order, would it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would be inclined to say to the Senator that he would decide that question after 2 o'clock if the Senator made the motion.

Mr. STONE. In all events, the Chair can say this, that if the motion should be made after 2 o'clock, the motion itself, to take it up in the way proposed, would be open to debate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question about it, under the rule.

Mr. STONE. And then the one side and the other could state to the Senate the reasons why it should be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no question about that. There never has been any question raised about that.

Mr. STONE. I should like to hear the reasons for the motion to discharge the committee.

Mr. CURTIS, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] addressed the Chair, and stated that he had some precedent which applied directly to this matter.

Mr. CURTIS. I yield to the Senator from Utah, who desires to read a section on precedents. When he concludes I wish to call the Chair's attention to two decisions on the same subject.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask the Chair to turn to page 602 of the Precedents, under the heading "Consideration of resolutions which have been laid over":

After resolutions have been called, and immediately upon the completion of the routine morning business, resolutions whose consideration on the day offered had been objected to are laid before the Senate in their order by the Presiding Officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution submitted on a previous day by the Senator from ———, which was objected to and went over.

(The resolution is read by the Secretary.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

(Debate may ensue; the resolution is open to amendment and all the motions to commit, postpone, etc. After which——)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the resolution be agreed to?

(Putting the question——)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is agreed to.

(A resolution having been under consideration in the Senate for one day during the morning hour, if not disposed of, is placed on the calendar, unless otherwise ordered.)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The precedent read by the Senator from Utah illustrates the desirability of obtaining the opinion of the Senate on this matter, if the Chair can obtain it, because the Vice President has adopted a different practice, and the Chair thinks——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico and Mr. CURTIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One moment, if the Senators will permit the Chair. The Vice President has adopted a different practice from that described by the Senator from Utah in the Precedents, and the present occupant of the chair thinks uniformity of decision by the Chair is of very great importance, and before he changes that opinion will submit the matter to the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas was recognized.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Chair and the attention of the Senate to the fact that Vice President Morton and Vice President Sherman both held the contrary view. I will read the decisions.

The Vice President (Mr. Morton) decided that a resolution which has gone over one day, and has been considered on a day following and not disposed of, could only come up again on motion or by unanimous consent.

The Vice President (Mr. Sherman) laid before the Senate the resolution submitted by Mr. NEWLANDS relating to proposed legislation, coming over from a previous day, which was discussed until the expiration of the morning hour at 2 o'clock p. m.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. Which shows that it was debatable.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does it show that the question was raised there as to whether it was debatable or not?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, that is the ruling.

Mr. CURTIS. It was the ruling.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand the question did not arise. Now, Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator this question: Has a resolution more dignity than a bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It has a different position.

Mr. OVERMAN. It has a different position, and what is the position? A resolution comes up automatically. The question then is voted on, not discussed, because the rule says it shall not be discussed. Now, at 1 o'clock——

Mr. CURTIS. I think the Senator is wrong in his last conclusion, because I believe under the rules a resolution coming over is debatable until 2 o'clock; and that contention is sustained by the two decisions which I read, one by Vice President Morton, where the resolution which had gone over one day and was considered the day following and not disposed of could only come up again on motion or by unanimous consent.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not think it decides anything of the sort.

Mr. CURTIS. Now, the question was raised in that case, but when the motion was laid before the Senate by Vice President Sherman the question was not raised, but the resolution was laid before the Senate and discussed until 2 o'clock. The Senator from Iowa had the floor when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived, and the Vice President asked him to suspend while he laid the unfinished business before the Senate.

Those two decisions show conclusively that it has been the practice to discuss these resolutions, and the order or the rule read by the Senator from Utah shows that they are debatable until 2 o'clock.

Mr. OVERMAN. Only by unanimous consent. Now, what is the purpose of the morning hour?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood that the Chair had submitted to the Senate the question whether the Senator from Iowa has a right to call up his resolution or not, and had also stated that in the determination of that question debate is not in order. I should like to have the regular order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator say that a question of order is not debatable?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Chair ruled that this question was not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On a point of order made and presented, if submitted by the Chair to the Senate, there is no doubt that it is debatable by the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. An appeal from the decision of the Chair is debatable, but the rule provides that when a question of order is raised it must be determined by the Senate without debate.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Chair asked Senators to submit their views and this is the very question to be decided. How shall we make this precedent? That is the question. What is the purpose of the morning hour?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I again renew the point of order that debate is not in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I make the point of order that the morning hour is over and it goes to the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair submits to the Senate the question as a point of order whether the Senator from Iowa has a right to have the resolution or motion which he has made for the discharge of the committee laid before the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. Before 1 o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At this time, during the morning hour.

Mr. OVERMAN. The morning hour is over.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; it runs for two hours.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Chair will permit me, what disposition could you make of the resolution if you do not lay it before the Senate? It is not referred to the committee. The resolution was introduced yesterday and it went over until to-day, and under the uniform practice it is laid before the Senate. You can not refer it to a committee; it is laid before the Senate; and the Senate can do what it pleases with it. It can lay it on the table or it can raise the question of consideration like on anything else. It seems to me the uniform practice is to lay it before the Senate, and then it is debated for two hours, and at 2 o'clock it goes to the calendar and can not come up any more except by motion. You will recall the resolution introduced here in connection with——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I again make the point of order that the question before the Senate is whether the Senator from Iowa has a right to bring his resolution up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has already so stated.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to make a point of order, or, rather, a suggestion. In order to save any trouble about the matter, I suggest to the Senator that he make his motion to proceed with it.

Mr. JAMES. The motion of the Senator from Iowa is to discharge the committee from the consideration of the joint resolution. The joint resolution has not been reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from Iowa is that his motion or resolution be laid before the Senate. The Chair submits to the Senate the question as to whether that is in order at this time.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I believe that we can adjust this matter without any further delay; and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the motion made by the Senator from Iowa be taken up for consideration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I object.

Mr. JAMES. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion would not be in order.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I asked unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Of course that ends it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those who believe that the Senator from Iowa is entitled to have his motion or resolution laid before the Senate at this time will say "aye." [Putting the question.] Opposed "no." The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it, and the Chair lays before the Senate the motion or resolution of the Senator from Iowa. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. That the Senate Committee on Woman Suffrage be discharged from the further consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 2, and that the same be placed on the calendar of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. The submission of the question to the Senate does not change my view. It is laid before the Senate, and the question whether it is debatable before 1 o'clock has not been settled.

Mr. CUMMINS. I care nothing about that question. All I want is the opportunity to say a word about it now.

Mr. President, there seems to be a misapprehension among some Senators with regard to the motion which I have made. My motion is not to proceed to the consideration in the Senate of joint resolution No. 2. I am not concerned at this moment with regard to the time or circumstances under which the Senate will take up the resolution for consideration. My motion, Mr. President, is that the Committee on Woman Suffrage, which has had the resolution under consideration, shall be discharged and that the resolution be placed upon the calendar for such action as the Senate may desire to take upon it at such time as the Senate may decide.

Mr. President, on the 4th day of April of the present year the distinguished Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] introduced a resolution which, after the ordinary preliminary statement, provides:

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

This resolution expresses, I know, the thoughtful, deliberate, and sincere conclusion of the Senator from New Mexico upon this important subject, and I want all who hear me to understand that I have no reason to believe, and I do not believe, that the enthusiasm of the Senator from New Mexico during the intervening months has in any degree been lessened or that his conclusion has in any respect been disturbed or changed by conditions that have occurred since that time. I say this in justice to the Senator from New Mexico. I have the highest regard for him. There is nothing personal in the motion I have made. Before I presented it I said to the Senator from New Mexico that I intended to present it, and that if he had any personal reasons for withholding it I would be exceedingly glad to consider whatever reasons he might have in the premises. He said he had none and that he desired the motion to be considered upon its merits.

The resolution to which I have referred was committed to the Senate Committee on Woman Suffrage. The committee held hearings, although I do not believe that the hearings modified the opinion of any member of the committee. This is a subject upon which every intelligent man has long had an opinion, and, while I am glad to know that the great cause is gradually moving forward, I think that at any given time the judgment of men will not be very much changed by hearings or arguments upon the subject. We have absorbed the information upon this matter necessary to enable us to reach a final conclusion upon it.

After these hearings were concluded, and, as I remember the chronology of the matter, that was about two months ago or more, the members of the committee who were present at the close of the last meeting in discussing the matter seemed to be agreed, although there were not a majority of them present at that time, that the members of the committee were unanimously in favor of the resolution, and in favor of an immediate report upon it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it not conceivable that the members of the committee were unanimously in favor of the resolution before they ever became members of the committee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. I was not a member of the committee on this side of the Senate which made up the committees for this Congress, and what information they had with regard to the sentiments of various members of the committee I do not know. I assume that Senators were selected for that committee upon proper consideration and not with wrong motives.

To return, it was understood at that time, although I do not assert it as a fact, that all the members of the committee were in favor of the resolution, and in favor of reporting it at once favorably. It was suggested, and the chairman was present at that time, that he write a report and that the members of the committee should sign it, and it then should be presented to the Senate and take its course upon the calendar of this body.

A long time has intervened and there has been no meeting of the committee. There has been no report. Whether anything has occurred since the meeting of the committee which I have just mentioned to make the chairman of the committee believe that this is not an opportune time to make a report upon woman suffrage, I do not know.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I will not assert anything with regard to that subject. Undoubtedly he has what he regards good and sufficient reasons for withholding the report or failing to call the committee together in order that he may be formally authorized to make it. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Was any effort made on the part of other members of the committee to induce the chairman to call a meeting of the committee?

Mr. CUMMINS. I was just coming to that.

Mr. NORRIS. Who is the chairman?

Mr. CUMMINS. The chairman is the distinguished junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], the author of the resolution to which I have referred.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, is the Senator aware that this session of Congress was called for the purpose of carrying on the war, that there has been a general agreement that the committees will only report out such measures as contribute to make the country strong to carry on the war, and that many committees have bills before them that they would like to report out, but which they are withholding so as not to encumber the measures that are necessarily war measures?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this committee held its hearings and reached a conclusion with regard to the merits of the resolution. So far as I am concerned, I look upon the resolution as definitely and certainly a war measure. There is nothing that this country could do which would strengthen it more than to give the disfranchised women of the country the opportunity to vote. We have just concluded our consideration of the proposed amendment relating to prohibition. Was that a war measure? I think it was, myself. I think it was imperatively necessary, and I may as well confess at this moment that one of the reasons which impelled me to bring forward this motion to discharge the committee is that the prohibition resolution will have a vastly better chance for ratification if in the meanwhile we give the women of the country the right to vote.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to say to the Senator that while I was in favor of the resolution and had no objections to its being reported, I, like the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], did not look upon it as a war measure. But more than that, as to the women who are obnoxious in picketing in front of the White House, I thought it was a good plan to wait until they abstained from picketing and showed their fitness and worthiness for woman suffrage. I do not think any woman who will go to the front of the White House and parade as those women have done is fit for suffrage.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not intend to be drawn into the wisdom or unwisdom of the campaign being made at the gates of the White House. That has no relevancy whatsoever to the present question.

Now I proceed to answer the inquiry propounded by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. Last week—I do not remember just what day, possibly Friday or Saturday of last week—I went to the chairman of the committee and told him it seemed to me that under the circumstances we ought to have a report; that we had finished the hearings, reached a conclusion, and that it was our bounden duty to make a report to the Senate. I reminded him of the circumstances of the last meeting of the committee, to which I have already referred. I asked him if he would not call a meeting of the committee on Monday. He said that it would be impossible, that he had some other engagement or engagements which would prevent a meeting of the committee on Monday. I asked him if he would not call a meeting of the committee on Tuesday, but his engagements prevented it. He then promised me, as I understood him—and I hope if I am wrong the Senator from New Mexico will correct me—he promised me that he would call a meeting of the committee for Wednesday. That is all that I wanted, an opportunity for the committee to either direct the chairman to make a report or to direct him to withhold a report. For some reason, which the chairman has not disclosed to me, he did not call a meeting of the committee for Wednesday, nor did he make any communication to me about it. He gave no reason for his failure to do what I understood him to promise to do. Thereupon I made the motion yesterday afternoon which is now before the Senate.

I believe profoundly that the committees of the Senate have no jurisdiction, no right, to trifle with the authority that is given to them by the Senate. For what purpose was the resolution referred to us? It was referred to us with the implied command to hear what was to be said upon the subject and then to make a report. Inasmuch as we have conducted the hearings and the members of the committee have reached conclusions with regard to it, I ask that the resolution be taken from the committee and placed upon the calendar, so that it will be subject to the order of the Senate. I do not know whether the Senate will desire to consider the resolution at this session or not, but I do know that it is our duty to put it in a position that will enable the Senate to deal with it whenever it desires to do so.

These are my reasons, Senators, for making this motion, and I close the matter as I began by saying that it must not be understood that there is any thought of discourtesy to the chairman of the committee. It must not be understood that I have the least doubt with regard to his fidelity to the cause of woman suffrage, but I do believe that he has reached a conclusion upon some reasoning unknown to me that the Senate ought not to have possession of the resolution at this session or at this time. I differ from him with regard to that conclusion, and it is to test the sense of the Senate that I have made the motion.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, when I was named by the Senate as chairman of the Committee on Woman Suffrage I made up my mind that I would try to perform a real service to the cause of woman suffrage, if I could do it. We all know the circumstances under which this session of Congress was called. Soon after the session was called, I remember on one occasion the Finance Committee in an informal way discussed the question as to what measures should be brought before this session of Congress. I believe it was the unanimous opinion of the members of the Finance Committee that there should not be brought before this session any matter which was not directly connected with the prosecution of the war. I have talked with a number of other Senators, and I believe that has been the universal consensus of opinion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am imperatively compelled to attend a meeting of the Committee on Rules, and I hope the Senator from New Mexico will not look upon it as any discourtesy if I leave the Chamber temporarily.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not in the slightest, although I should have liked to have obtained some information from the Senator from Iowa. If he will permit me, I will take the liberty of asking him now what I intended to ask him a little later. Before the Senator retires, I should like to ask him the question whether he has made a poll of the Senate so as to determine the question of the likelihood of the passage of this joint resolution? Does the Senator from Iowa believe that if this joint resolution were brought before the Senate now it would be passed?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I have not made a poll of the Senate upon this joint resolution. I have never made a poll of the Senate on any question. To me that is one of the most abhorrent things. I will not even ask a Senator how he intends to vote upon any given proposition.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to ask the Senator further if he has discussed with other Senators the propriety of bringing before the Senate for consideration the joint resolution suggesting an amendment to the Constitution?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have discussed with a good many Senators the propriety of bringing the joint resolution from the committee to the Calendar of the Senate. I have not discussed with any considerable number of Senators, probably with none, the propriety of bringing the joint resolution up for consideration and action.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I can only express my regret, Mr. President, that, as a member of the Committee on Woman Suffrage, the very able Senator from Iowa has not endeavored to find out the status of this measure as to the probability of its consideration at this session, and also as to whether or not it would likely pass were it brought up for consideration.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Mexico will allow me, I assume that every Senator will vote his conscience upon not only this question but upon every other; and, so far as I am individually concerned, I am always willing to take that conscience upon any pending measure.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to ask the Senator a question, and I ask it in all good faith and sincerity. I ask the chairman of the committee why this joint resolution has not been reported? The Senator, who is chairman of the committee, I suppose knows as well as I do that the people of the entire country are anxious to have this joint resolution submitted and to be given an opportunity to vote upon it. I think that is true as to the conditions in every State. Why should not this joint resolution be reported to the Senate and we be given an opportunity to vote upon it?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the purpose of my addressing the Senate is to try to make a statement along that line.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, being chairman of the committee, I have endeavored to keep in as close touch with the situation as I could, considering my various duties in the Senate. I have discussed the matter with Members of the Senate as to the question of bringing the joint resolution up for consideration at this session. I have also discussed the question with Senators who are members of the committee as well as a number of Senators who are not members of the committee, as to the advisability of reporting the joint resolution at this particular time.

It was not long after the opening of this session of Congress before I called a meeting of the committee. There were only two members of the committee present besides myself, but, without calling the roll, we assumed a quorum present and directed that the hearings upon the joint resolution proceed. We had those hearings; I think we had hearings on four different days. It was my purpose, if possible, that when a report should be brought in it be brought in with the unanimous support of the committee; I hoped to get every member of the committee to sign the report. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who made a few remarks a moment ago, is a member of the committee. There are other members of the committee who have expressed their views as to the propriety of submitting a report at this time.

It has been my own purpose, so far as I could wield any influence, to bring in a report at this session of Congress. It was my further purpose to devote some personal effort in the preparation of a report which might contribute something to the cause. If I had ample time, I do not know that I should be able to do that. Doubtless the able Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who has just addressed us, and some others have said all that can be said in favor of woman suffrage; but, at any rate, I thought that if I had an opportunity I should be glad to study the question and try to present the matter in such form as might appeal to the country at large. Since those hearings were had, however, my time has been almost completely occupied by service upon the Finance Committee. I think many Senators here realize the very difficult task which has been undertaken by that committee.

On last Friday or Saturday for the first time the able Senator from Iowa asked me about submitting a report on the joint resolution. I told him that I hoped to get to work on the report as soon as the situation in the Finance Committee would enable me to do so. He asked me then if I would not call a meeting of the committee on Monday or Tuesday or Wednesday of this week. I told him the Finance Committee was at work all the time, and that I could not take up this work until after the work of the Finance Committee was disposed of. That committee, as Senators know, has been in session all of this week; it is in session this forenoon and will go into session again within an hour. That is the situation.

I do not want to say that the very able and amiable Senator from Iowa exemplifies the character which we have all witnessed in a celebrated comic opera, of the man who "wants what he wants when he wants it." The Senator does not fill that character completely this morning, because he did not pound the table, but that, I am afraid, is what is influencing the Senator. I would not say that the purpose of bringing the matter up at this time is to enable him to make some remarks very favorable to the cause of woman suffrage for the purpose of getting the plaudits of some of those who, regardless of the situation, seem to be insistent now to have the report made. I would not say the Senator has occupied that attitude, because I am quite certain that if from the beginning of this session of the Senate on every occasion, whether opportune or otherwise, I had risen on the floor and sought to bring before the Senate this great question I might have had some advertisement and received the plaudits of a great many people of the country; but, Mr. President, I have been trying to handle this matter so as to perform a real service to the cause. I do not want to have it prejudiced in the minds of any Senator or anyone else throughout the country. If I have erred in the course pursued, then it is an error of judgment, and the Senate, of course, has a perfect right to control my judgment, so far as my being chairman of the committee is concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator if, in his judgment, he was authorized by the committee to make the report, and if so, when that action was taken by the committee?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will state, Mr. President, that there has never been a meeting of a majority of the committee, and no member of the committee ever requested that a committee meeting be called until the Senator from Iowa on last Friday or Saturday made that request.

Mr. President, it has been my purpose—and in spite of the very enthusiastic and able remarks of the Senator from Iowa I am still in favor of woman suffrage—and I still intend at some time during this session of Congress to bring in a report from the committee. I hope to do so at as early a date as I am able to get around to the work.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I asked the Senator the question a moment ago, and I am asking the question I am about to ask with a view of getting information so as to vote intelligently on the question. I do not think the Senator quite understood my last question. In his judgment, will he be able to make a report to the Senate without a further meeting of the committee? Does he regard himself as authorized to make the report?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No; I do not.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator feels as though he would have to call a meeting of the committee before he could report the joint resolution?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Well, Mr. President, I had intended to prepare a report and to try to secure the signature of every member of the committee to it so as to avoid the necessity for a formal meeting. That had been my purpose; but, in view of the attitude of the Senator from Iowa, who is a member of the committee, I shall certainly call the committee together to consider the question.

Mr. NORRIS. That leads me to another question. I take it from what the Senator from Iowa has said that at the time he interpreted the action of the committee to mean that the chairman was authorized or instructed to make a report, and that while there was not a majority of the committee present, the members of the committee who were present, believing that the entire committee were in favor of the joint resolution, had instructed the chairman to report it and to get the signatures of members of the committee, or, in other words, as we do here frequently, to poll the committee. Was that the Senator's idea of that meeting? Is it the recollection of the Senator of that meeting that he could have done that and that he was authorized to take that course at that time?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, there was no authorization at all. There was never any meeting of the committee at which a majority was present, and there could have been no authorization to do anything; but I was going to assume to do what is frequently done by committees of the Senate, namely, to get up the report and pass it around and secure the signatures of the members of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I think, Mr. President, that the statement that has just been made by the Senator from New Mexico probably will solve this whole problem. It is difficult to hear accurately in this position, but as I understood the Senator, he said it was his intention to call a meeting of the committee within a brief period and let the committee determine upon its course. Is that correct?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I made that statement; but if the Senator accepts that statement in lieu of the purpose sought to be accomplished by this motion, then I would prefer to remain silent upon the question.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, that is a sort of tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee proposition in which I think few of us are concerned. The question, it seems to me, is whether or not a committee that has agreed upon a specific course may be permitted to present their ultimate conclusion upon that course to the Senate, or whether the chairman of a specific committee may, in his judgment, refrain from permitting the committee to act in any fashion that it sees fit.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, perhaps I ought to have added a word to my statement a moment ago. I am quite sure that if the members of the committee want a meeting of the committee to be called, that action will be taken; but up to the present time the very able Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is the only member of the committee who has requested that a meeting be called.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, may I suggest, as a solution of this entire problem, that we have a meeting to-morrow or the next day, and pass the pending motion temporarily? What is the use of debating this particular question if we can meet to-morrow or the next day or at any other time that is convenient, and determine the proposition for ourselves? I make that suggestion to the Senator from New Mexico. It seems to me that would solve the matter that we are discussing.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the chairman of the committee, who is the only one who has a right to call a meeting of the committee, will say to the Senate or say to me or say to the Senator from California or to any other Senator that he will call a meeting of the committee within two, three, or four days for the purpose of passing on the question, I shall be entirely satisfied and will not press the motion I have made.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I thought that that was exactly the attitude of the Senator from Iowa, and I felt that, when the Senator from New Mexico made his statement, it was exactly his attitude, and so, not being accustomed to dividing a hair twixt north and northwest side, I thought we might solve this entire proposition and conclude debate upon it by agreeing that a meeting of the committee should be held within two, three, four, or five days, as the Senator from New Mexico might desire to suggest.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to state to the Senator from Iowa, who was not present during a portion of my remarks, that I explained to the Senate that the reason I had not called a meeting of the committee in accordance with our conversation was because I had been constantly engaged in the Finance Committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, may we take it for granted, then, that within the next few days a meeting of the committee will be called?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If it is left to me, the committee will be called together within a reasonable time.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Well, I take it that would mean within a few days. That solves the problem with me.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from California if he has made a poll of the Senate to determine whether or not a majority of the Senators want to bring this question up for discussion at this session of Congress?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I have made no such poll, Mr. President; but that is not what is involved in this particular controversy. My design has been, in speaking thus far, not to take issue with the one side or the other, but I thought I saw a solution of the entire matter in the remarks that were made by the Senator from New Mexico. If I am in error in that, then I may proceed upon another idea and theory.

The question here is not whether we favor woman suffrage or whether we favor something else. I, of course, favor woman suffrage, coming from the State of California. That is not the point. The point is whether a chairman of a committee within his bosom alone shall have the fortunes of everything that is presented to that committee, that he and he alone may determine every matter within the jurisdiction of the committee, and whether the members of his committee shall have no voice in what shall be done in regard to the matters that are before that committee. Now, that particular phase of the question I thought it unnecessary to discuss after what was said by the Senator from New Mexico. I am sure that he does not want to be in that attitude; and I am equally sure that the Senator from Iowa, in presenting the matter, did not wish to be in the attitude of caviling or of criticizing concerning the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to interrogate the Senator a little further. Will the Senator explain to me what he thinks would be acccomplished by putting on the calendar at this time a report upon this joint resolution, if the joint resolution is not to be considered at this session of Congress?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. That, Mr. President, is not the question that is at issue here. It is not a question of what I think will be accomplished. The question is as to the right of all of the members of a particular committee to have a determination by that committee as to what shall ultimately be done with a matter before the committee. The question is whether the members of the committee shall determine for themselves what they wish done with matters within their jurisdiction, or whether the chairman of a committee shall ar-rogate to himself the sole power of determination for all the members of the committee, and they shall be utterly nil, so far as the committee is concerned.

If the chairman of the committee will call a meeting of his committee, we can all get together and determine exactly what shall be done, and of course the members of the committee ought to have that right. So I do not discuss the question of suffrage, or the question of whether ultimately it will pass, or even whether it should be brought up for hearing before the Senate. That is not the purpose of the matter at all.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a further question—whether he has ever said a word to me about bringing in a report?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Only through the Senator from Iowa. Four of us, I think, united in asking the Senator from Iowa to make a request of the Senator from New Mexico with respect to the calling of the meeting, and the Senator from New Mexico errs in getting into a spirit of antagonism and opposition to the committee. There is no such spirit among the members of the committee toward him. All they ask is that they be permitted to meet; and why should the chairman of a committee say to all the members of his committee: "You can not meet. You can not consider what is before you. You shall not be permitted to report it, and you shall not be permitted to be heard concerning it."

That is what apparently confronts us. If the Senator will give us a meeting, that is all that we desire.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am a member of the committee and feel that I should say a word or two. I think I attended every hearing that was had before the committee. I remember, at the last hearing which was given to a delegation, that it was understood that they intended to urge early and prompt action by the committee upon the joint resolution. I had another committee meeting on that morning, and I appeared at the hearing before the Woman Suffrage Committee and made the statement with reference to the necessity of my attendance at another meeting, and also the same statement in behalf of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. I also said this just before leaving:

Mr. Chairman, I think I should also say that, as I understand the purpose of this meeting, I am heartily in accord with it, as far as my personal views are concerned.

That is, I was in favor of an early and prompt report of the joint resolution. I have never changed my mind in that respect.

Just a word or two now with reference to the suggestion of the chairman regarding what members of the committee may have said to him. As I think he will recall, I have spoken to him once or twice with reference to a report. I do not remember that I urged the calling of any committee meeting, because I think this was the suggestion that I made to him—that he prepare a report; that I understood all the members of the committee were favorable to the joint resolution; that he could prepare the report and get the members of the committee to sign and submit it without a meeting, or that, if a meeting were called, it could be acted upon; and I suggested to him that I thought it ought to be reported soon.

Now, Mr. President, I agree with the position of the Senator from Iowa that this is a war measure, and ought to be considered such at this time. I made that statement in the discussion of the Army bill. That was my view. I do not see how we can very consistently talk democracy while disfranchising the better half of our citizenship. Other Senators may not look at it in that way. I do think that this joint resolution ought to be reported, at any rate.

The action of some of the women, which was referred to by the Senator from Minnesota, does not affect my views with reference to the merits of woman suffrage. If the principle that apparently has the sanction of the Senator from Minnesota were followed out, we would take proceedings right away to disfranchise all the men in the country, because there are a good many men throughout this country who are doing things now that certainly do not meet with the approval of patriotic men; things that lessen our power and weaken our strength and endanger our success in the great conflict we are engaged in. But I do not think that because they are doing those things we ought to disfranchise the men of the country, or, if they were seeking something that was for their good, that we ought to oppose it because a few are doing what we may not think is right.

I may not approve of the action of the women in picketing the White House, and I will say frankly here that I do not approve of it. Neither do I approve of what I consider the lawless action toward those women in connection with that picketing; but neither phase of that matter affects my views with reference to the merits or demerits of woman suffrage.

Now, I think the Senate is entitled to have this joint resolution reported.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not criticizing the chairman of the committee, either. I know that he has been a very busy man, and I know that he is in favor of the joint resolution. I know that he expressed to me the idea that he would prepare a report as soon as possible, and I was satisfied that he would do it, and I feel that he has not been derelict in that matter; but I think it would be highly proper to call the committee together and give the committee the right to say whether the report should be made or not, and the character of the report.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to ask the Senator, if he is in favor of having the committee meet, and the majority of the committee desires to meet, why the majority has not called a meeting, just as has been done in many other cases?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why, Mr. President, nothing of that kind has ever been done on any committee that I have had any connection with during my service in the Senate. It may have been done in other committees.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will say to the Senator that it has been done repeatedly, and there is no question of the power of a majority of a committee to call a meeting. To my mind, it would be a much more orderly thing to do than to bring this controversy before the Senate in this way and attack the chairman of the committee.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, Mr. President, I did not bring this motion before the Senate and I am not attacking the chairman; but the motion is here, and I see justification for it and I am in favor of it.

I want to say this, however: It has always been my understanding that unless there is a rule to the contrary, no committee can be called together except by the chairman, and that a majority of that committee, by signing a petition, can not bring the committee together. How can they do it? As I say, it has never been done upon any committee of which I have been a member during my service in the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I think, in the case of all the committees on which I have served, if any member of the committee wanted a meeting of the committee called, all that it was necessary to do was to suggest it to the chairman and it has been called. I do not know why that would not be done in the case of the Woman Suffrage Committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, the Senator from Iowa asked for a calling of the committee, and the committee was not called. The Senator from New Mexico has stated why, and I do not question his statement; but I do say this—and I think the Senator will confirm me in this—that there is no way to call a committee meeting except by the call of the Chair, unless there is some other provision made with reference to some particular committees, and there is no provision of that kind with reference to the Woman Suffrage Committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When a quorum of a committee gathers, after notice to all the members, it does not make any difference whether that notice is given by the chairman or by the secretary or by a majority of the committee; it is there with power to act, and it has acted in a number of cases.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, no notice is ever sent out except upon the order of the chairman. No notice can be sent out except by the chairman. The secretary of the committee is under the chairman's control, and acts only upon his direction. This is the first time I have ever heard any contention of that sort made in this body—that a majority of a committee, by signing a paper requesting a call and then meeting, would make that a meeting of the committee. If that is the rule, there will be several meetings of many of the committees that have not heretofore been meeting.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Washington a question.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Would it not be much more of a reflection upon the chairman for a majority or four or five members of the committee to call a meeting and hold it without regard to the chairman than to proceed in the way I have done?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, I think so. I do not think anything of that kind has ever been done, and I do not think any course like that ever will be followed in the Senate. I do not think it will be necessary.

I was glad to hear the chairman of the committee suggest that a meeting of the committee would be called. I hoped, when that suggestion was made, that such an arrangement would be made and that a meeting of the committee would be called in the very near future, so that a report could be formally authorized. That would obviate any question with reference to this motion of the Senator from Iowa.

I think myself that this joint resolution ought to be reported. It ought to be put on the calendar. It is the duty of the committee to put it there with a favorable or an unfavorable report, and then whether it will be considered by the Senate or not, of course, will rest with the Senate. As has been said, the merits of this proposition are not involved upon this motion. The committee is the agent of the Senate. It has held its hearings upon a question referred to it by the Senate. There can be no good reason for it not reporting its conclusions to the Senate upon this resolution. I do not want to think the chairman does not desire to call the committee together because of some influence outside of Congress, as some have suggested. I know he has been very busy; I know he is for the resolution, and I trust he will call the committee together. If it authorizes a report, it will give him abundance of time to prepare the report, and when he prepares it I know it will be an able one.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I have the greatest respect and admiration for the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from California. I am glad to work with them for suffrage or in any other good cause. I am very strongly for woman suffrage. I am very strongly for this amendment. But the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from California are both men of force and vigor and temperament, and they are trying to rush the chairman of the Committee on Woman Suffrage.

There is not any doubt at all that any member of the Committee on Woman Suffrage can get a meeting called, but, in my judgment, there is no member of the Committee on Woman Suffrage that can get a meeting held, that can get a quorum there. I believe it will be impossible to do it.

It is precipitate for one or two members of a committee to ask the chairman to call a meeting on Friday or Saturday, and then bring the matter before the Senate on Wednesday. That is too short a notice when the chairman of the committee is a member of the Finance Committee, and when everyone knows that the Finance Committee is working hard to get a report before the Senate, so that we may take up and consider the war-revenue bill. I think my friends, when they reflect, will see that they have tried to press it too hard.

Now, there is something that is bound to come up here and that we might just as well face.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from New Hampshire ought to remember that after the Senator from New Mexico had given me reason to believe that he would call a meeting on Wednesday he made no suggestion to me thereafter that he would be unable to do it, so that I could reach no other conclusion than that he did not desire to do it.

Mr. HOLLIS. I had not understood the Senator from New Mexico to admit that he gave any such assurance to the Senator from Iowa.

I have been reasonably active on the Committee on Woman Suffrage. I have done as much as any member to secure a unanimous favorable report this year, and I have probably done more. I probably know more about how the members of the committee stand to-day than anybody else. I have been asked to preside at some of the hearings, and I have done so, at this session. It had not come to me that any member of that committee wanted a meeting of the committee. If it had, I would have been glad to go to the Senator from New Mexico and request him to call a meeting at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to get the Senator's judgment on the question on which I have tried to get the judgment of the Senator from New Mexico. After the meeting that the Senator from Iowa has told the Senate about, a month or two ago, at the time the hearings were concluded, was it the understanding of the Senator from New Hampshire that the Senator from New Mexico was authorized and instructed to report the joint resolution and to get the signatures of other members who were not there? Was the Senator present at that meeting?

Mr. HOLLIS. I was not present, so I can not state; but I have been requested by certain members of the committee to ascertain how certain other members of the committee stood on the question, and I have not been able yet to find how one member of the committee does stand. I think it is very desirable not to have a report on this joint resolution until we can get a unanimous report. I believe it is impossible to get it, and there is one member of the committee that is doubtful now.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think that the vote of that Senator could be obtained in favor of the joint resolution by waiting? Will it be more likely to bring about a unanimous report if we wait than if we have the report at once?

Mr. HOLLIS. Of course this is only my personal judgment, but my personal judgment is very decidedly yes. This is the trouble, and it might just as well be stated: There is a small but very active group of woman suffragists who have acted in such a way that some of us who are ardently in favor of woman suffrage believe that their actions should not be encouraged by making a favorable report at this time. Now, I am one of those.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me just one second?

Mr. HOLLIS. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I merely want, with the permission of the Senator from New Hampshire, to make a dissent to the idea, because time is so limited now that the actions of any group of women in this country in any particular should influence a committee in determining whether or not suffrage should be granted.

Mr. HOLLIS. I am sorry that I can not agree with the Senator. I think that at this time to take the very unusual course of the motion and the effort of two members of a committee who seek to usurp the functions of the chairman of the committee and try to get the committee discharged from the consideration of a matter as important as this would focus the attention of the country upon the action and would give undue weight to what has been done by the group of active woman suffragists to whom I have already adverted. I should be opposed to a favorable report at this time myself, although I favor a favorable report at this session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, under the rule the resolution goes to the calendar.

The resolution (S. Res. 109) submitted by Mr. CUMMINS, was placed upon the calendar, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on Woman Suffrage be discharged from the further consideration of S. J. Res. 2, and that the same be placed on the calendar of the Senate.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 3, 8, 13, 16, 22, 24, and 42.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 5, 6, 7, 12, 14, 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 25, 26, 27, 33, 34, and 35, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following:

"Waterway connecting Buzzards Bay and Cape Cod Bay, Mass.: The Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce are hereby authorized to examine and appraise the value of the works and franchises of the Cape Cod Canal, Mass., connecting Buzzards and Cape Cod Bays, with reference to the advisability of the purchase of said canal by the United States and the construction over the route of the said canal of a free waterway, with or without a guard lock, and having a depth and capacity sufficient to accommodate the navigation interests that are affected thereby. This investigation shall be conducted under the direction of the Secretary of War and the supervision of the Chief of Engineers in the usual manner provided by law for making preliminary examinations and surveys except that the Secretary of War shall call upon the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of Commerce for such data and evidence as these Secretaries may wish to have incorporated in the report of survey, and further, that the final report of the investigation, with its conclusions upon probable cost and commercial advantages, and military and naval uses of the said canal, shall be submitted to the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce for their action before it is transmitted to Congress.

"If the said Secretaries are all in favor of the acquisition of the said canal, the Secretary of War is hereby further authorized to enter into negotiations for its purchase, including all property, franchises, and appurtenances used or acquired for use in connection therewith or appertaining thereto; and he is further authorized, if in the judgment of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce, that the price for such canal is reasonable and satisfactory, to make contracts for the purchase of the same, at the option of the United States, subject to future ratification and appropriation by the Congress; or in the event of the inability of the Secretary of War to make a satisfactory contract for the voluntary purchase of said Cape Cod Canal and its appurtenances, he is hereby authorized and directed, through the Attorney General, to institute and carry to completion proceedings for the condemnation of said canal and its appurtenances, the acceptance of the award in said proceedings to be subject to the future ratification and appropriation by Congress. Such condemnation proceedings shall be instituted and conducted in, and jurisdiction of said proceedings is hereby given to the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, substantially as provided in 'An act to authorize condemnation of land for sites for public buildings, and for other purposes,' approved August 1, 1888; and the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated to pay the necessary costs thereof and expenses in connection therewith. The Secretary of War is further authorized and directed to report the proceedings hereunder to Congress."

Transfer item so modified to page 32 of the bill, after line 3.

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 11: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 11, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Transfer the matter included in the proposed amendment to page 37 of bill, after line 19; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 28: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 28, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: At the beginning of the proposed amendment insert the words "Sec. 9" and strike out the comma after the word "fortifications" in line 16, page 9, of Senate amendments, insert in lieu thereof a period, and strike out the following words: "or by any plant or facility engaged in the execution of any public project or river and harbor improvement; and the said Secretary of War shall have like power to regulate the transportation of explosives upon any of said waters"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment change the section number from "11" to "12"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 36: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment change the section number from "13" to "14"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 38: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 38, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment change the section number from "15" to "16"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 39: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 39, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment change the number of the section from "16" to "17"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 40: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 40, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment change the section number from "17" to "18"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 41: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 41, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In the proposed amendment change the number of the section from 18 to 19, and after the words "civil life," in line 19, page 11 of Senate amendments, insert the following words: "and the remaining five of whom may each be selected either from civil life or the public service," and strike out the words "it may adopt" in line 21, page 11 of Senate amendments, and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "the President may prescribe, and subject to the approval of the heads of the several executive departments concerned," and after the words "active list" in line 24, page 12 of Senate amendments, insert the following words: "and no member selected from the public service shall receive additional compensation for services on said commission."

"SEC. 19. That a commission, to be known as the Waterways Commission, consisting of seven members to be appointed by the President of the United States, at least one of whom shall be chosen from the active or retired list of the Engineer Corps of the Army, at least one of whom shall be an expert hydraulic engineer from civil life, and the remaining five of whom may each be selected either from civil life or the public service, is hereby created and authorized, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, and subject to the approval of the heads of the several executive departments concerned, to bring into coordination and cooperation the engineering, scientific, and constructive services, bureaus, boards, and commissions of the several governmental departments of the United States and commissions created by Congress that relate to the study, development, or control of waterways and water resources and subjects related thereto, or to the development and regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, with a view to uniting such services in investigating, with respect to all watersheds in the United States, questions relating to the development, improvement, regulation, and control of navigation as a part of interstate and foreign commerce, including therein the related questions of irrigation, drainage, forestry, arid and swamp land reclamation, clarification of streams, regulation of flow, control of floods, utilization of water power, prevention of soil erosion and waste, storage, and conservation of water for agricultural, industrial, munipical, and domestic uses, cooperation of railways and waterways, and promotion of terminal and transfer facilities, to secure the necessary data, and to formulate and report to Congress, as early as practicable, a comprehensive plan or plans for the development of waterways and the water resources of the United States for the purposes of navigation and for every useful purpose, and recommendations for the modification or discontinuance of any project herein or heretofore adopted. Any member appointed from the retired list shall receive the same pay and allowances as he would if on the active list, and no member selected from the public service shall receive additional compensation for services on said commission, and members selected from civil life shall receive compensation of $7,500 per annum.

"In all matters done, or to be done, under this section relating to any of the subjects, investigations, or questions to be considered hereunder, and in formulating plans, and in the preparation of a report or reports, as herein provided, consideration shall be given to all matters which are to be undertaken, either independently by the United States or by cooperation between the United States and the several States, political subdivisions thereof, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals within the jurisdiction, powers, and rights of each, respectively, and with a view to assigning to the United States such portion of such development, promotion, regulation, and control as may be undertaken by the United States, and to the States, political subdivisions thereof, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals such portions as belong to their respective jurisdictions, rights, and interests.

"The commission is authorized to employ, or retain, and fix the compensation for the services of such engineers, transportation experts, experts in water development and utilization, and constructors of eminence as it may deem necessary to make such investigations and to carry out the purposes of this section. And in order to defray the expenses made necessary by the provisions of this section there is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as Congress may hereafter determine, and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, available until expended, to be paid out upon warrants drawn on the Secretary of the Treasury by the chairman of said commission.

"The commission shall have power to make every expenditure requisite for and incident to its authorized work, and to employ in the District of Columbia and in the field such clerical, legal, engineering, artistic, and expert services as it may deem advisable, including the payment of per diem in lieu of subsistence for employees engaged in field work or traveling on official business, rent of offices in the District of Columbia and in the field, and the purchase of books, maps, and office equipment.

"Nothing herein contained shall be construed to delay, prevent, or interfere with the completion of any survey, investigation, project, or work herein or heretofore or hereafter adopted or authorized upon or for the improvement of any of the rivers or harbors of the United States or with legislative action upon reports heretofore or hereafter presented."

And the Senate agree to the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Florida a question with reference to the provision in the report relating to the Waterways Commission. I notice that it has been changed to read in this way with reference to the appointment of the commission:

Consisting of seven members to be appointed by the President of the United States, at least one of whom shall be chosen from the active or retired list of the Engineer Corps of the Army, at least one of whom shall be an expert hydraulic engineer from civil life, and the remaining five of whom may be selected either from civil life or the public service.

Under the words "selected from public service" I wish to ask whether the Senator understands that the President could appoint a Cabinet officer to this position?

Mr. FLETCHER. My view of it is that that language does not materially change the amendment passed by the Senate, but that it makes it a little more specific, perhaps. As to that I should suppose that all five of the members could be appointed from civil life, and there is nothing in the amendment passed by the Senate that would prohibit, it seems to me, the appointment of a Cabinet officer.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator knows that the Senate committee was overwhelmingly opposed to having members of the Cabinet upon this commission, and while the Senate committee did not expressly say that no Cabinet officer should be upon it, it did not suggest that these other members could be taken from the public service. It was clearly understood that Cabinet officers would not be considered as eligible to that position, and it made their salaries $7,500, which would preclude their appointment, because the salary of a Cabinet officer is greater. But as the amendment is now changed it expressly authorizes the President to take these members from the public service, and then they are to get no different salary from that which they get in the public service.

I want to know—and I should like to have a frank statement from the Senator—whether it is the idea that we are going to authorize the President, if he sees fit, to put Cabinet officers upon the commission? If that is not the purpose, I hope the Senator will say so, so that the RECORD will show it and it can not be said hereafter that something has been put over on the Senate by those who are especially anxious to get a commission composed of Cabinet officers and that we have given the President authority to do it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I can only say, so far as I am concerned and so far as it seems to me the plain wording of the amendment reaches this, that at least Cabinet officers would be eligible; but I have no idea that the President intends to appoint any Cabinet officers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to ask the Senator whether it was the purpose of the conferees in that language to make Cabinet officers eligible to this commission?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; the conferees did not have that purpose, as I understand it at all. There were suggestions of this kind made to the members of the committee, that perhaps a member of the Coast and Geodetic Survey might be eligible for a position on the commission and might be a valuable man on the commission.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly, and I would have no objection to that—none at all.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am only using that as an illustration. I do not know whether there is any purpose or idea of appointing anyone, but that suggestion has been made, and some reasons have been given why that was deemed a wise thing to do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that would be wise. I say frankly to the Senator now that I think something of that kind would be wise.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is to provide for a situation like that that the language was used in this way.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator from Alabama will permit me, I will conclude in just a minute. I merely wish to say this, Mr. President: It is known that the Senate committee was overwhelmingly opposed to the provision as it was presented to the committee authorizing the President to appoint a Cabinet officer a member of the commission. The matter was considered and passed upon by the committee, and they rejected that proposition. If it had been considered that Cabinet officers would be authorized to be placed on this commission, that provision would not have been reported in any form by the committee.

I just wanted that to appear in the RECORD, and I wanted to get a statement from the Senator having charge of the bill that the language there does not contemplate that Cabinet officers shall be placed upon this commission. If I thought that was the purpose of it, I would oppose this report just as long as possible, because I deem it most unwise to place Cabinet officers upon commissions of this kind. I am not going to take the time to tell why now. I think our experience in the past has demonstrated the unwisdom of it. I might say that in my judgment the great defect in our Council of National Defense now is that it is composed of Cabinet officers and not composed of the advisory council, which ought to be made the Council of National Defense and be given authority to act. But I am not going into that. I am going to take the statement of the Senator from Florida with reference to it, and I trust that we shall not be confronted hereafter with placing the commission in the hands of Cabinet officers, and that it would be clearly contrary to the actual intent of Congress.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, when the proposition for this so-called commission was before the Committee on Commerce it was thought best to provide that three or five, I am not sure which, Cabinet officers should be members of the commission. The Senator from Washington has stated correctly that the committee was almost unanimously opposed to the appointment of Cabinet officers on the commission, not because of any lack of confidence in Cabinet officers but because it was well known that if Cabinet officers were put on the commission they must appoint some clerks in their departments to perform the service; that they could not do it; they have no time to do it. That was one of the reasons why this opposition was developed.

I wish to ask the chairman a question. He knows my view on this matter, because I expressed it in the committee. I should like to ask the chairman if it was understood in the conference committee that this is a material change in the language of the Senate provision. I should like to ask him to state candidly if it was not understood that this change was made for the purpose of authorizing the President to appoint Cabinet officers on the commission.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator wants an answer to the question, and I will say that that was not the express purpose of the conferees at all. It was thought that the language used here was a little plainer than the language in the amendment that was passed, and it has been enlarged in respect to the appointment of the board.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is the commission provided by the Senate subject to confirmation by the Senate?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Was not that in the amendment?

Mr. FLETCHER. No. That has not been changed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Was it not in the original bill presented to the committee?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; there was no provision of that sort in the original bill or in the amendment as adopted by the Senate or in this provision. In fact, the amendment, as adopted by the Senate, has not been changed at all in that respect. The number of members was not changed, but it was simply provided that they might come from public life as well as from civil life.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator from Florida has stated to the Senate that it is not the purpose of the President to appoint Cabinet officers as members of the commission?

Mr. FLETCHER. I can not say what the purpose of the President is. I could not answer as to that.

Mr. WEEKS. What was the purpose of the conference committee? Is it that the President shall not appoint Cabinet officers?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is that the five members shall come from civil life and that they may come from those holding public office. As I mentioned a moment ago, for instance, some engineer from the Coast and Geodetic Survey might be available and some other official might be available. It leaves the field open. I presume under this provision the President might name a Member of Congress, but I do not see that any Member of Congress could afford to fill it, because it is going to take a good deal of time and a lot of work and all that sort of thing. I merely mentioned that as an illustration of what I should imagine might be covered by it.

Mr. WEEKS. That statement is equally true as to Cabinet officers. I am not a member of the Committee on Commerce, and I have not followed the course of this particular item in the bill, but I feel very strongly the desirability of excluding from these important commissions, and this will be an extremely important commission, men whose time should be devoted to their departmental or their legislative duties. No department head has the time to personally give attention to the work of a commission of this kind. He is going to drop in on the commission occasionally, and he is going to have much greater influence over the action of the commission than his own personality would ordinarily give because of his connection with the administration; whatever administration it may be, he will have a dominating influence if he happens to be a strong man. This commission, which is to cover a multitude of subjects, all of which are important, should have members who have no other employment, who could devote their entire time to the service for which the proposition provides. I hope it will be distinctly understood that that is to be the course which is likely to be followed.

I think the members of this commission should be confirmed by the Senate. I do not think it is wise that it shall be done in any other way. I say that without reference to the present President, but I think that is good public policy.

One could talk for hours about Cabinet officers who are members of commissions but who are unable to perform the duties which are incident to those commissions, who do their work through a subordinate, and who at the same time really dominate the whole action of the commission. We have had during the present administration one instance of that kind which I think has done irreparable damage to the work of an important commission. I sincerely hope that nothing of the sort will result from the appointment of this one.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I want to say just another word. I have been in favor for many years—almost since the proposition was advanced by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]—of a commission to coordinate the various functions of government in various lines of Government work, but I have always been opposed for the reason suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and other reasons, to placing Cabinet officers upon such a commission. When it was first suggested, Cabinet officers were not proposed as members of it. It was proposed to be an independent commission, with authority and power to act and with the time to act. That was the idea of the committee in reporting the amendment, and they agreed to that in lieu of that which was proposed by the chairman of the committee.

Now, this legislation is being enacted by Congress. It is not what the President proposes to do, as suggested by the Senator from Florida, but it is what Congress intends him to do as proposed and suggested by its legislation.

I do not understand from the Senator from Florida that it is the intention or expectation that the President shall appoint Cabinet officers to this commission. I think it ought to be clearly understood that that is not the purpose of Congress; that Congress does not desire to have that done; that Congress does not want this burden placed upon Cabinet officers.

I wish to say that if Cabinet officers should be put upon this commission, the commission's work will be interfered with and its efficiency will be destroyed; and it will also be found that Congress, in my judgment, will resent any action of that kind contrary to what is really the sentiment of Congress.

I accept in good faith the statement of the Senator from Florida that this change was made so as to enable the President to take, if he thought wise, some man of special qualifications or some man specially fitted by work along certain lines, like the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey or like the Director of the Reclamation Service, for instance, or some man especially familiar with water-power matters and put him on the commission. That would be all right. I think that would be highly desirable, and I would be heartily in favor of it. That would carry out the real purpose and intent of Congress in organizing this commission, and I hope that will be done. I hope that no attempt will be made to act contrary to the will of Congress as it has been expressed here.

Mr. POINDEXTER obtained the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator just a minute to say that as far as the language is concerned——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. I wish to make a comment in connection with the remarks of my colleague [Mr. JONES of Washington] and to call the attention of my colleague and of the Senator from Massachusetts to a feature of this provision which they are probably better qualified to appraise at its real merits than I am, for I have not given as much attention to the provision as they have done. As it is framed here, while it may not be contemplated that a Cabinet officer should be a member of the commission, every Cabinet officer in whose department any of the work to be supervised by the commission is has a veto power on the work of the commission. It seems to me that that has in it the possibilities of destroying almost entirely the efficacy of the commission. I think my colleague was engaged in conversation with another Senator while I was speaking about this matter. I say there is an express provision in this report providing for this commission which gives to each Cabinet officer a veto power over the work of the commission.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say to my colleague that I have not had time to read the entire report. I did not suppose there was any such authority as that given. Of course, that would be very unwise, I think.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It seems to me it ought to have been left out. I am not disposed to oppose the conference report on that account, but I am not willing for it to go by, now that my colleague has raised the issue, without calling attention to it. It seems to have been assumed in the answer to the queries made by the senior Senator from Washington and the Senator from Massachusetts that Cabinet officers would have no right of interference with the work of the commission, whereas there is an express provision in the report giving them that power.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will my colleague read that provision?

Mr. POINDEXTER. After providing for the commission and specifying what it shall do it says:

> Under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe and subject to the approval of the heads of the several executive departments concerned.

Subject to the approval of the heads of all the executive departments.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; if the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, that merely refers to rules and regulations laid down by which the commission is set to work and shall proceed with its work. That does not give them a veto power over the work of the commission at all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It undoubtedly does. The Senator can not change by his ipse dixit the effect of the language of this provision. A commission is created, and after specifying who shall be chosen, one a member of the Engineer Corps of the Army, at least one a hydraulic engineer from civil life, and five others, who may be chosen from official life or may be from civil life, it is provided that they shall have certain power to act, under regulations fixed by the President and subject to the heads of the executive department concerned. There can not possibly be any doubt about the effect of it; it is bound to be construed in the way I have indicated. Any agent in a department, any official in a bureau of a department who has particular charge of an irrigation project or of a river and harbor improvement makes his report to the head of the department. The head of the department is going to accept his report, is going to act upon his advice; because he is the official designated for the purpose of devoting his time to that particular work, and of knowing about it, and is regarded as an expert upon the subject. The Secretary is not. We know what the machinery of the department is. It is beyond the control of the heads of departments, It reverts back in its final control to somebody who is scarcely ever seen in the light of the sun, who lives in a back office, who is an expert upon some particular matter, who writes letters; and the Secretary does not know whether the letters are wise or unwise. It is a subject in the multitudinous duties of the department which he has not been able to master. He signs the letter when it is put before him. So the approval or the rejection of the work of this commission ultimately will go back to the very bureaus and agencies that now have control of the various branches of the work.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] is right in the matter; but the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] is now here—he is a member of the committee of conference—and I should like to get his understanding as to the provision in the conference report with reference to the appointment of members of this commission from civil life and from the public service. Is it or is it not the intention to authorize the President to put Cabinet officers on this commission?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to say that that is not at all the purpose of the provision. The purpose of making the change in the conference report was to authorize the President to appoint as members of the commission experts in the civil departments of the Government, men who are already in the service. Being in the service, the Government, of course, would incur no expense in the matter of salaries by reason of their appointment; there would be no additional expense, except for traveling and subsistence. If the Senator will read the language he will see that it does not contemplate the appointment of Cabinet officers. It reads:

and the remaining five of whom may each be selected either from civil life or the public service.

That does not contemplate, and I do not think it was the purpose—at any rate, it did not so strike me—that Cabinet officers may be appointed. It simply means that the Government may utilize experts already employed in the departments. The President can appoint from either civil life or the public service. Suppose, of the five men the President can select either from civil life or from the public service, he appoints three men from the public service and two from civil life, entirely outside of the public service, the most that could be said of that would be that those who are taken from inside the public service would be represented in the final result by the Cabinet officers to whose departments they belonged.

This amendment—and I might say I looked at it in that light—was framed in a spirit of economy. The bill provided for an Army engineer as one of the appointees. Now, if two or three members of the commission are taken from the civil service of the Government, we shall have no additional salaries to pay them, and there will be that much less expense for the commission. So it seemed to me very desirable and the best thing which could be done under the circumstances.

I might say in this connection, Mr. President, that I have not much faith in the entire provision. Even though we should put the Angel Gabriel at the head of the commission, I doubt whether it could be of great value. I think if my good friend from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], instead of devoting his energies to coordination and cooperation in this matter, would devote them to coordination and cooperation in respect to our transportation facilities, in order that our railroads might coordinate and cooperate with our water carriers, that would be a much more valuable enterprise.

Mr. President, I am getting to be an old man and the sands of my life will soon run out; but I want to say that if I were a young man, and were to remain here in the Senate. I should make a special effort to secure legislation to force our railroads to coordinate and cooperate with our water transportation, to the end that both might be utilized to the fullest extent.

In these days we hear much of car shortage. We had a hearing this morning in respect to coal matters—something in which we in Minnesota are greatly interested—before a board of railroad officers. They told us about the car shortage. I said to them, "Gentlemen, you are partly to blame for that, because you have failed to cooperate and to coordinate with our water carriers. If you framed your rates in such a way that water carriers could live, so that they could be utilized to the utmost, there would not be any car shortage. You would have plenty to do and our water carriers also would have plenty to do."

So, Mr. President, while I voted blindly for this provision of the Senator from Nevada, while I shut my eyes, as it were. yet I believe in perfecting it as much as possible. I think we have improved it a little in the respect to which I have referred; but I repeat the wish that the able and energetic Senator from Nevada would hereafter devote his energies to the coordination and cooperation of the railways and waterways to which I have referred, instead of to the coordination and cooperation which is involved in this provision of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2477) to authorize the construction of a building for the use of the Treasury Department. I wish to make a statement in regard to the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Virginia that several Senators asked to be informed when that measure was to be called up so that they might be present.

Mr. SWANSON. I will say to the Senator that I notified all whom I thought were interested in the subject.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. MCNARY. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on account of official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have submitted a motion to take up for consideration a bill to erect a building for the Treasury Department on the vacant lot owned by the Government between the Treasury and the Belasco Theater.

The Government has owned that land ever since 1882. It was formerly occupied by the Department of Justice. Ever since 1882 the Government has owned that land, and repeated efforts to put a building on it have failed. It is valued at $575,000.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. NELSON. Is that the ground west of the Riggs Bank, and alongside the theater?

Mr. SWANSON. It is the ground west of the Riggs Bank. That will enable the Treasury Department to have 100,000 square feet of office space. The Government was offered a very high price for that property, but the Government imposed conditions in connection with the character of building to be constructed there, requiring that it should be a nice building, on account of the proximity to the Treasury Department and the White House, and the sale was not consummated. Now the time has come when the Government ought either to dispose of that property or to erect a building on it.

The Treasury Department is renting to-day 67,719 square feet of space. It has asked additional rentals of space aggregating 38,730 feet, on account of the new boards that are associated with the Treasury Department—the Farm Loan Board, the Federal Reserve Board, and the Insurance Board. It is estimated that between two and three hundred additional clerks will be needed on account of the pending war-revenue measure in connection with internal revenue and additional war taxes; and if this space is allowed, which I am satisfied it will be, the Treasury Department then will rent 106,449 square feet.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I thought the Senator said the Treasury Department was renting that amount of space now.

Mr. SWANSON. I said it was renting 67,719 square feet, and that it has asked for 38,730 more feet on account of the increased space needed.

Representatives of the Health Department have gone to the officials of the Treasury Department and stated that the Treasury Department was too crowded at present for the health of the employees. There are so many clerks in the Treasury Department in proportion to space and size of rooms, and in the corridors, that they have made a report that additional space is needed to conform to the principles of hygiene.

This bill will enable the Treasury Department to have 100,000 square feet of space, which will cover all the needs of the Treasury Department. The rental of office space like this is very high. I understand that the Munsey Building is rented for $1 a square foot. The Treasury Department rents in the Bond Building 7,746 square feet for $7,500. It rents 10,000 square feet in the Munsey Building for the Coast Guard at $10,000. It rents some other space, used for minor offices and for storing, at a somewhat less rent. I think the department pays now $18,850 for 67,719 feet, which would be an average of about 43 cents a square foot, scattered all over the town as it is. If the second, third, fifth, and sixth floors in the Bond Building are rented, as they have asked, at the present rental of $1 a square foot, it would make the amount that the Government pays per square foot a great deal in excess of that.

In view of the fact that the Government owns this land and pays no taxes on it, it can put up a handsome, ornamental building there at $12.50 a square foot. I have seen the plans. They have been submitted to the committee. It will be an ornamental building, worthy of the Treasury and the White House; and the amount of money involved is $1,250,000, which at 3½ per cent would make it cost the Government 40 cents per square foot.

Now, rentals are going up in Washington. It is hard to get buildings that are suitable, and this is the only way in which the Treasury Department can be expanded, the purpose being to erect a building there conforming in architecture to the Riggs Building, the White House, and the Treasury Department, and have an underground passage to connect it with the Treasury. The Treasury then will be expanded, as it should be, and have all the space it needs.

It seems to me that it is wise for the Government to do this. Now, if you are going to erect a building on your own property—and it is not proposed to buy any property—there can be no other place found anywhere for the enlargement of the Treasury. This is the only place where it can be enlarged, and enlarged in a manner that will practically make it a part of the Treasury. The Treasury Department can not be enlarged in any other way, and it has not been enlarged, except from rentals, since the time the building was constructed.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield, and to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. POMERENE. I desire to ask the Senator from Virginia a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. In the second section of this bill I note that the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized, without regard to civil-service laws, rules, or regulations, to obtain such special architectural or other technical services as he may deem necessary and specially order in writing. Now, in that department they have special architects, and so forth, who design public buildings generally. What is the need of that particular department employing additional architects when they already have architects of their own?

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the architects of the department are about three years behind now in preparing plans for buildings already authorized. Their force has not been increased for years, and there is an indisposition to increase it. Consequently, in the case of these large buildings, they have usually employed an outside architect.

Mr. POMERENE. And a good many buildings have been put up in that way that ought never to have been constructed.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know any buildings in the city of Washington that ought not to have been constructed.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, I am not speaking of the city of Washington. I am speaking of some of the public buildings throughout the country.

Mr. SWANSON. We pay between six and seven hundred thousand dollars a year for rentals here, and every time a proposal comes up here to construct a building we find it nearly impossible to get it through, with the result that we pay now in Washington about $700,000 a year in rentals. The Government has enough land to construct its own buildings on, and yet it rents buildings and pays in its rentals the value of the land, the insurance on the building, and the profit to the builder.

Mr. POMERENE. I hope the Senator does not understand that I am opposed to this bill. I favor the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. POMERENE. But I am certainly opposed to the employment of additional architects when there are architects in that department, unless it is shown conclusively that it is necessary to be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there are a good many reasons that appeal to me why the money appropriated in this bill should not be expended at this time. I will state that if we are going to erect a building as an adjunct to the Treasury Department, the location suggested by the chairman of the committee is an ideal one.

Congress has already created a Building Commission, giving it power to locate and examine all the property owned by the United States, and to learn exactly the floor space of all buildings in Washington that are being rented by the Government and the rent per square foot that the Government is paying for those rented buildings, with instructions to report to Congress the views of the commission as to erecting buildings sufficient to house all of the Government employees. That report is not ready, Mr. President, and I think when it is made it ought to cover one complete program or policy of the Government; and when Congress embarks upon the policy as recommended, if adopted, it should be done systematically, and at a time when it could be carried forward without undue expense to the Government.

To-day is a very poor time to erect a building to house temporary employees in the city of Washington. We can not say that this bill is an emergency measure, as the building will not be completed for over a year; that is certain. It is impossible to erect a building that will be an ornament to the corner on which it is to be built in a year's time; and now, when the cost of everything that goes into buildings is almost prohibitive, costing perhaps 100 per cent more than it will cost immediately after the close of the war, with labor almost impossible to secure, and, when secured, only to be had at unreasonably high prices, as compared with wages paid during normal times in the building trades, it seems to me it is exceedingly unwise to authorize the building of a structure as contemplated in the bill.

Why, Mr. President, this $1,250,000 will not go any further now than $750,000 would have gone two years ago; it will not erect any better building; and the Government of the United States must take into consideration the fact that there is $500,000 of dead loss in erecting this building at this time. Now, that would pay rent for space required for a long time, Mr. President, and for a good many square feet for a good many years.

This is the business side of the proposition. I notice from the report that the Senate is supposed to believe that in order to secure sufficient accommodations for the clerks that are employed in the Treasury Department—and the building, if erected, is to be used only by the Treasury Department—we will have to pay a dollar and a half a square foot. Mr. President, the Appropriations Committee have appropriated money for renting space in the Bond Building, and we have never appropriated more than 45 cents per square foot for space in the Bond Building. The Appropriations Committee was promised by local parties to erect the building in which the Commerce Department is now located, the rent not to exceed 33½ cents a square foot, as I remember it, for all of the building. If the Treasury Department to-day are paying a dollar a square foot for space in the Munsey Building, it is because they never had to come to the Appropriations Committee and ask the Appropriations Committee to appropriate any such amount. It is paid out of some lump-sum fund, and they have given just exactly what the owner of the Munsey Building has asked.

Now, Mr. President, is it necessary? The Government owns to-day a whole block of buildings near the present Treasury Building, beginning with a hotel on the corner, including Poli's Theater and all of the buildings on the south side of Pennsylvania Avenue down to the next corner and around the corner to the other end of the block. All of that block is owned by the Treasury Department.

Mr. SWANSON. Owned by what department?

Mr. SMOOT. By the Government of the United States.

Mr. SWANSON. But that is not the Treasury Department.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, it is under the control of the Treasury Department, and there is no doubt but that any day the tenants in those buildings can be ordered out and the Government of the United States can take charge. It seems to me that while we have so many square feet of space in buildings that are owned by the Government we should not begin at this time to erect buildings that we know will cost at least 40 per cent more than if they are built in ordinary times.

I am simply calling this matter to the attention of the Senate, not with any hope whatever that this bill is going to be defeated; but I say now that if the Senators would look at it as a business proposition, they would very much prefer to wait until the commission reports, and then let us begin and build properly and carry out the plan or program reported to Congress, if Congress agrees to the plan or program.

Mr. President, I am compelled to leave the Senate Chamber now. The Finance Committee is in session at this time and we want to get the war-revenue bill reported to the Senate this week. Therefore I shall say no more, but I believe that this is a very, very inopportune time to spend a million and a quarter dollars in constructing a building that can not be constructed in time to take care of the extra employees, who, just as soon as the war is over, certainly will not be in the employ of the Government.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have listened to the Senator from Utah. The Public Buildings Committee of the Senate is responsible for buildings. The Appropriations Committee provides the rentals. We have no authority to provide rentals. Every time the Appropriations Committee comes in here with a bill there is a great discussion as to why the Government pays between seven and eight hundred thousand dollars a year in rentals to people in Washington. As chairman of the Public Buildings Committee I have repeatedly sought to get the Government to construct its own buildings on its land and stop paying these excessive rents.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. STERLING. I wonder if the Senator from Virginia can state what proportion of that seven or eight hundred thousand dollars is paid for rental for the Treasury Department?

Mr. SWANSON. I have just stated that.

Mr. STERLING. I did not understand the statement as to the Treasury Department.

Mr. SWANSON. The Treasury Department rents to-day 67,719 square feet.

Mr. STERLING. At what cost?

Mr. SWANSON. At a cost of $18,850. It has asked for the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth floors in the Bond Building, which it is compelled to have, at a rental of $37,500. That is the price at present being paid, which would make that department rent from outsiders 106,449 square feet. That is what will be rented outside by the Treasury Department. This contemplated building will have 100,000 square feet, which will make the Treasury Department cease to be a renter of space in Washington.

Now, what is the proposition? That the Government can not take its own land, on which it pays no taxes, and construct thereon its own building as cheaply as it can rent buildings from other people, pay for the land in the rent, pay for the taxes, and pay for the insurance; and under that theory between seven and eight hundred thousand dollars each year is paid in rentals in Washington!

There is no use in delaying this matter at all. There is no other way in which to expand the Treasury Department. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] says that if you intend to construct buildings for the Treasury Department, this is the proper place to do it. It is properly located. It is adjoining the Treasury Department. The Government owns the land. It is valued at $575,000. It is the purpose to have an underground passage connecting it with the Treasury Department. They have estimated, at the present cost of everything, what it will cost the Government to put up an ornamental building there. We are bound to have a handsome one to house the Farm Loan Board, the Federal Reserve Board, and other important branches of this Government that are now crowded and going from place to place, trying to get space at forty-odd cents a square foot—and some of the rentals would exceed that, at $1 a square foot—and the amount you would be compelled to pay for office rent would be $100,000. By doing this, you will save the Government between forty and fifty thousand dollars a year over the rentals it pays for office space.

Why should not the Government make that saving? The Senator said that the cost of constructing buildings was going up. Rents are going up in the same proportion. The Senator talks about the space down here. I brought in a bill two or three years ago to construct a building for the State Department and the Department of Justice, so that the Army and Navy could have ample space, on the site owned by the Government to which the Senator has alluded, opposite the Treasury Department and the New Willard Hotel. This bill was pending here and was beaten by people who pretended that they were renting cheaper than the Government could build on its own property. To-day the War Department, the Navy Department, the State Department, and others are paying excessive rates. Why? Because, after repeated efforts by me as chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I have been unable to secure authority for the construction of buildings here in Washington.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator whether the Government is now occupying and using the buildings that are on the three blocks south of the Willard Hotel?

Mr. SWANSON. The Government has been renting those buildings. Those buildings were bought for the purpose of constructing upon the site a building for the State Department and the Department of Justice. Plans were prepared; architects were paid forty or fifty thousand dollars to prepare those plans; the committee unanimously reported in favor of the construction of a building there for the State Department and the Department of Justice, so that the Army and Navy and the Department of Justice would not be renting buildings for their use to-day. That bill has never passed; and it has been considered unwise to spend thousands and thousands of dollars to make those buildings suitable for office purposes when we are renting them and when the Government bought them for the specific purpose of erecting on the site a building for the State Department and the Department of Justice.

If the Government has no intention of ever constructing a building there for the State Department and for the Department of Justice, we might as well appropriate some money to remodel these old buildings, so that they could be utilized for offices; but it has always been considered unwise to spend money to put those buildings in shape for offices when next year we might use the ground for the purpose for which it was bought, and for which plans have already been prepared and bills reported to Congress and not passed.

Now, Senators, I am anxious for this bill to pass. Every time the Appropriations Committee comes in here with a bill the Public Buildings Committee is subject to criticism because we are paying so much rent in Washington. Every time we have a bill here for the Government, not to buy an acre of land but to construct its own buildings on its own property and showing that we can build for less than we can rent, some objection prevails, and it has been impossible to get these buildings constructed.

I think that the Government ought to house itself in Washington. I am not one of those who believe that the Government can pay interest on real estate in the shape of rents, pay taxes on real estate in the shape of rents, and pay profits on buildings constructed cheaper than it can build its own buildings on its own land.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Treasury Department needs more space. I have no doubt that the particular place where it is proposed to construct this building is the proper place to expand the activities and increase the quarters for the working force of the Treasury Department. If I thought the time were opportune, I would be in favor of this bill. But, Mr. President, it does seem to me that at a time when we are straining every nerve for the purpose of raising revenue we should not go to the expense of building an ornamental building, costing over $1,000,000, that in all probability we will never be able to utilize until the war is over.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President. if the Senator will permit me, the Secretary of the Treasury told me that he felt sure that he could have that building constructed easily within a year.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, the Secretary of the Treasury will have to get a livelier move on him than he has ever had before if he does it.

Mr. SWANSON. I will say, in addition to that, that I had a letter from the department saying that office rents are going up greatly in Washington now, on account of the fact that the cost of buildings is going up, and that the rental of available floor space has gone up from a dollar to a dollar and a half.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I have no doubt that rents have gone up. I realize that.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I figure that if you will issue bonds bearing 3½ per cent interest for the $1,250,000, and compare that with what you have to pay now for space in the Munsey and Bond Buildings for offices for the Government, the Government would save each year in rent between $50,000 and $60,000 by constructing this building on its own land. I should like to have the Senator consider that phase of the question.

Mr. NORRIS. I will discuss that phase of it before I get through. If I forget it, if the Senator will remind me of it, I will take it up.

I was about to say, when the Senator interrupted me, that at this particular time, when we are exercising our ingenuity for the purpose of devising new methods of raising revenue, it seems to me that it is not wise to go to the expense of appropriating millions of dollars for the purpose of erecting ornamental buildings for the use of any department of the Government. I am not opposed to the erection of an ornamental building, a suitable building, at this place at the proper time. I think we ought to do it, and some day we will. But the Senator says we can issue these bonds, and that it will be a good investment. Why, Mr. President, that is one of the things I want to get away from. We have been issuing bonds. We are very likely to issue a lot more bonds, and generations that are yet unborn are going to bend their tired backs and sweat and toil to pay the bonds that we are going to saddle upon the country. The time is now here when every man ought to economize. We ought not to try to saddle bonds on the country for the purpose of erecting beautiful buildings that are going to be used after the war is over. We are going to have all the bonds we can digest before we get through. We ought to get away from that idea. That is the thing we ought to avoid.

The Government now owns three blocks on the south side of Pennsylvania Avenue that we bought several years ago upon which there are buildings, one of them five stories in height—a hotel building. I suppose that for temporary quarters patriotic employees of the Government would not object to working in offices of that kind during the war. There are stores there, restaurants, boarding establishments, and rooming houses; and they have a theater there. We are renting that to-day, getting rent, I presume, from somebody for its use, and we are going, then, to spend the money of the taxpayers to construct an ornamental building costing a million and a quarter dollars because we have not suitable places for the employees to work. I presume the employees of the Treasury Department would be entitled to a lot of sympathy if during the war, instead of working between marble walls and at mahogany desks, they would temporarily have to work in the rooms of this hotel; but we, as holders of the purse strings of the Government, ought to require it if we have departments that are so extravagant that they would undertake to spend money in these times in constructing buildings when we could utilize what we already have without paying a dollar of rent.

Mr. President, this proposition at the present time ought to shock the Congress of the United States, as it would shock the taxpayers of the United States if they realized it. But we have gotten to such a stage that all you have to do to get money out of the Treasury of the United States is to say it is a war measure and must be had immediately. All of us know how the Government constructs its buildings. Although I am not able to say how long this war will last, I do not believe, when any Senator or Member of the House considers how we construct buildings and the length of time that it takes, anyone has any idea that this building will ever be occupied during the war. We are going to construct it at a time when it will cost 100 per cent more to construct it than it would under ordinary circumstances and in ordinary times. That is not economy; it is extravagance.

Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio has called attention to section 2, where we are going to provide that in the construction of this building we will disregard the civil-service laws and select the architects from outside, when we have hundreds of architects competent to prepare plans and specifications for this building, that is going to be a copy, I presume, of the Treasury Building just across the street. The answer to it is that the architects are behind in their work of constructing buildings throughout the country. It would not be a bad plan if the Government suspended erecting public buildings throughout the United States until the war is over. It would not do very much damage if some of those buildings were postponed, and there could be enough architects now in the employ of the Government and drawing a salary taken from the regular force to prepare the plans and specifications of this building, without extra expense to the Government of the United States.

It all goes to the question of extravagance. We may belittle it now; we may think it does not amount to anything, but we are coming upon an era when the expenditure of every cent is going to be looked into. We are going soon to approach a time when the people of the United States are going to realize that we have squandered their money here in Congress, that we have spent it by the million—yes, by the billion—extravagantly and uselessly. Every man ought to be patriotic enough during this war to economize. Government officials ought to do it. Not only as Secretary of the Treasury, but as the son-in-law of the President he ought himself to practice economy before the country. Here is the place where he can do it. There is not any reason, if we shall construct this building, why we should go out and employ outside of the Government force architects to prepare the plans.

But, Mr. President, there is another reason. Every employee on this building during the war will be taken from some other employment. We are short everywhere. The cry is going up now to get men to work in all the departments to carry on this great war, and every man you put on this building to work during the war time, not for the carrying on of the war but to prepare a model home for Treasury employees after the war, will be taken out of some other occupation where he might do the country some good and assist in carrying on work that is connected with the war.

I do not suppose anything that can be said will make any difference in the passage of this bill.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, the Government requires so much space for its employees. If the Government does not construct buildings, other people will construct buildings for the Government. It is cheaper for the Government to construct its own buildings.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me the Secretary of the Treasury could go down and take people out of these rooming houses and these stores and shut up that theater, that picture show, close up the hotel, let the barbers go somewhere else out of the barber shop, and put seven or eight hundred employees into that space, where the Government would not pay any rent at all.

Besides, I repeat to the Senator that this building in all human probability will not be occupied by the additional employees who are going to be hired. It can not be put up to-morrow or next week or next month. So when we need a place for these extra employees it is not going to help that situation. When the war is over, I take it, we can cut down the list, and we will not need as many employees as we have now, and then we can construct a building for half the money.

Mr. President, I enter my protest against this kind of legislation more as a matter of form than anything else. I think it is a serious proposition. I say "matter of form," because I realize that so far as any man has opposed an appropriation he has never been able to get anywhere, no matter how useless the appropriation might be. I presume this money will be appropriated and it will be expended. We are going to need every dollar of it to carry on the war, and we are going to need it very badly. I give it as my judgment that the Senate will find out before the war is over that we have not commenced to economize with Uncle Sam's money as we would economize with our own. We ought to do it, and we ought to do it now.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I believe it is an excellent policy for the Government to own all the buildings in the city of Washington used for housing the departments of the Government. When a Member of the House of Representatives, serving upon the Committee on Appropriations, I argued in favor of that idea. But I recall that on many occasions a department head appeared before that committee and insisted that he could rent buildings cheaper than the Government could construct them. I have in mind the Department of Commerce building, to which the distinguished Senator from Virginia has referred. That question came before a subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee of the House at a time when I was a member of it. The Secretary of Commerce argued long and insistently that he could do better for the Government in renting than in building.

Mr. President, I know something about building construction matters; it happens to be my own business; and I think it can be fairly said that it would cost 100 per cent more to-day to erect a structure of the character provided in this bill than it would have two or three years ago, and at least that much more than it will cost after the war is over.

I wish to say to the Senator from Virginia that I shall be glad to join with him in working out a comprehensive plan to construct buildings to house all our departments when the present war is over, when we can build them cheaply and properly without expending such vast sums of money for them.

Ordinarily, too, I differ with the last section of the bill in permitting the employment of outside architects, but there are times, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], when it pays to employ an expert architect. If the architectural staff in the Department of the Treasury are not competent to handle this work, then for the sake of a few thousand dollars we ought not to refrain from obtaining outside advice. However, for my part, I shall vote against this bill on the ground that the time is not opportune for constructing buildings because of their abnormal cost.

Mr. WARREN. There is not any kind of question but that when the Treasury Department adds anything in the way of another building to its present capacity, this is the place where the building ought to go. There is not any question, on the other hand, but that it has cost the Government already in carrying this particular piece of property unimproved more than once and probably twice the cost of the proposed building. I recall that the Government has owned this property for some 35 years. It missed the opportunity in the meantime to acquire for $150,000 the land north of it where the Belasco Theater and the building next to it are located. The piece of property has been carried—I do not know exactly what it has cost, but I do know that I personally——

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, we bought it in 1882 for $250,000.

Mr. WARREN. That was 35 years ago. I will say as to what it was worth that I—not for myself, but for others—offered $500,000 spot cash for it some years ago when Mr. MacVeagh was Secretary of the Treasury, and advocated before him the desirability if they were not going to build on it of taking the money instead of holding the lot when it was more or less of an eyesore. After consideration for two or three days the report came from the Secretary of the Treasury that while they might dispose of it, and while they believed that the amount offered might be all it was worth, they wanted to know what kind of a building was to go up and wanted a pledge that it should be in sky line and in general architecture a fitting match to the Treasury Building, the White House, the War Building, the Riggs Bank, and so forth, that were built near it.

The parties whom I represented were of course unable to make a guaranty, because they intended to go higher in the air.

The Secretary of the Treasury was right about it. Nothing should be built on that particular corner except an ornamental, substantial structure to correspond with its surroundings.

Years ago, when I first had a place on the Appropriations Committee, we, so far as the Senate is concerned, bought the building near here down at the foot of the Capitol Grounds, which was so long used for a Census building. We agreed to buy it on such a basis that the rent we were then paying would make it earn the Government over 14 per cent per annum. The House in conference would not entertain the matter, and so we went on paying rent until we had bought the building once and a half over, and then left it and moved out into another rented building.

There is seldom a time when we admit we have money to spare to put up public buildings in Washington. We all hesitate. It may be that this is not the proper time to expend $1,200,000, but I have seen so much of this never being ready to do anything and continuously being run into the expenditure of buying property earning nothing and paying rent somewhere else that I am going to vote to begin immediately to construct this building. However, if there shall be offered, as I understand there will be, an amendment to cut out a part of the second paragraph, I shall vote for that, for I believe that our own architects are capable of drawing plans for the building.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. KENYON. It seems to me in voting to take up such an important war measure as this we should have a quorum. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to submit the conference report on the so-called food-control bill. Of course the Senate can not consider it until it has been acted upon by the House, but I desire to have it printed so that it may be on the desks of Senators.

"SEC. 25. That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, whenever and wherever in his judgment necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, to fix the price of coal and coke, wherever and whenever sold, either by producer or dealer, to establish rules for the regulation of and to regulate the method of production, sale, shipment, distribution, apportionment, or storage thereof among dealers and consumers, domestic or foreign; said authority and power may be exercised by him in each case through the agency of the Federal Trade Commission during the war or for such part of said time as in his judgment may be necessary.

"That if, in the opinion of the President, any such producer or dealer fails or neglects to conform to such prices or regulations, or to conduct his business efficiently under the regulations and control of the President as aforesaid, or conducts it in a manner prejudicial to the public interest, then the President is hereby authorized and empowered in every such case to requisition and take over the plant, business, and all appurtenances thereof belonging to such producer or dealer as a going concern, and to operate or cause the same to be operated in such manner and through such agency as he may direct during the period of the war or for such part of said time as in his judgment may be necessary.

"That any producer or dealer whose plant, business, and appurtenances shall have been requisitioned or taken over by the President shall be paid a just compensation for the use thereof during the period that the same may be requisitioned or taken over as aforesaid, which compensation the President shall fix or cause to be fixed by the Federal Trade Commission.

"That if the prices so fixed, or if, in the case of the taking over or requisitioning of the mines or business of any such producer or dealer the compensation therefor as determined by the provisions of this act be not satisfactory to the person or persons entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

"While operating or causing to be operated any such plants or business, the President is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he may deem essential for the employment, control, and compensation of the employees necessary to conduct the same.

"Or if the President of the United States shall be of the opinion that he can thereby better provide for the common defense, and whenever, in his judgment, it shall be necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, then he is hereby authorized and empowered to require any or all producers of coal and coke, either in any special area or in any special coal fields, or in the entire United States, to sell their products only to the United States through an agency to be designated by the President, such agency to regulate the resale of such coal and coke, and the prices thereof, and to establish rules for the regulation of and to regulate the methods of production, shipment, distribution, apportionment, or storage thereof among dealers and consumers, domestic or foreign, and to make payment of the purchase price thereof to the producers thereof, or to the person or persons legally entitled to said payment.

"That within 15 days after notice from the agency so designated to any producer of coal and coke that his, or its, output is to be so purchased by the United States as hereinbefore described, such producer shall cease shipments of said product upon his own account and shall transmit to such agency all orders received and unfilled or partially unfilled, showing the exact extent to which shipments have been made thereon, and thereafter all shipments shall be made only on authority of the agency designated by the President, and thereafter no such producer shall sell any of said products except to the United States through such agency, and the said agency alone is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase during the continuance of the requirement the output of such producers.

"That the prices to be paid for such products so purchased shall be based upon a fair and just profit over and above the cost of production, including proper maintenance and depletion charges, the reasonableness of such profits and cost of production to be determined by the Federal Trade Commission, and if the prices fixed by the said commission of any such product purchased by the United States as hereinbefore described be unsatisfactory to the person or persons entitled to the same, such person or persons shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

"All such products so sold to the United States shall be sold by the United States at such uniform prices, quality considered, as may be practicable and as may be determined by said agency to be just and fair.

"Any moneys received by the United States for the sale of any such coal and coke may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any moneys not so used shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"That when directed by the President, the Federal Trade Commission is hereby required to proceed to make full inquiry, giving such notice as it may deem practicable, into the cost of producing under reasonably efficient management at the various places of production the following commodities, to wit, coal and coke.

"The books, correspondence, records, and papers in any way referring to transactions of any kind relating to the mining, production, sale, or distribution of all mine operators or other persons whose coal and coke have or may become subject to this section, and the books, correspondence, records, and papers of any person applying for the purchase of coal and coke from the United States shall at all times be subject to inspection by the said agency, and such person or persons shall promptly furnish said agency any data or information relating to the business of such person or persons which said agency may call for, and said agency is hereby authorized to procure the information in reference to the business of such coal-mine operators and producers of coke and customers therefor in the manner provided for in sections 6 and 9 of the act of Congress approved September 26, 1914, entitled 'An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes,' and said agency is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise all the powers granted to the Federal Trade Commission by said act for the carrying out of the purposes of this section.

"Having completed its inquiry respecting any commodity in any locality, it shall, if the President has decided to fix the prices at which any such commodity shall be sold by producers and dealers generally, fix and publish maximum prices for both producers of and dealers in any such commodity, which maximum prices shall be observed by all producers and dealers until further action thereon is taken by the commission.

"In fixing maximum prices for producers the commission shall allow the cost of production, including the expense of operation, maintenance, depreciation, and depletion, and shall add thereto a just and reasonable profit.

"In fixing such prices for dealers, the commission shall allow the cost to the dealer and shall add thereto a just and reasonable sum for his profit in the transaction.

"The maximum prices so fixed and published shall not be construed as invalidating any contract in which prices are fixed, made in good faith, prior to the establishment and publication of maximum prices by the commission.

"Whoever shall, with knowledge that the prices of any such commodity have been fixed as herein provided, ask, demand, or receive a higher price, or whoever shall, with knowledge that the regulations have been prescribed as herein provided, violate or refuse to conform to any of the same, shall, upon conviction, be punished by fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both. Each independent transaction shall constitute a separate offense.

"Nothing in this section shall be construed as restricting or modifying in any manner the right the Government of the United States may have in its own behalf or in behalf of any other Government at war with Germany to purchase, requisition, or take over any such commodities for the equipment, maintenance, or support of armed forces at any price or upon any terms that may be agreed upon or otherwise lawfully determined."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 71: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 71, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lines 13 and 14 of said amendment strike out the words "imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than six months nor more than three years" and insert in lieu thereof the words: "a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both"; and strike out the proviso beginning on line 21 and ending on line 26, and insert in lieu of said proviso the following: "Provided further, That this section shall not be construed to prohibit the holding or accumulating of any such article by any such person in a quantity not in excess of the reasonable requirements of his business for a reasonable time or in a quantity reasonably required to furnish said articles produced in surplus quantities seasonally throughout the period of scant or no production."

Change the section number to "26."

And the Senate agree to the same.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2477) to authorize the construction of a building for the use of the Treasury Department, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I intended to offer an amendment to the pending bill, but it seems there is a committee amendment which is first to be acted upon. I will, therefore, withhold my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 1, page 2, after line 2, it is proposed to insert:

The plans for such public building to be approved by the Commission of Fine Arts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the chairman of the committee why the Commission of Fine Arts should have anything to do with this building at this time? I should think that in this war time, in view of all the expense to which the Government is put, if we needed any additional building, it ought to be something in a plain, substantial mode instead of a mere work of art. What has the Commission of Fine Arts to do with this building, anyway?

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio will permit me, I will state that this building is to be erected opposite the Treasury Department, west of Riggs Bank and east of the White House; and I do not suppose anybody who has any pride in Washington as the Capital of the Nation would desire a building erected there at any time which would not be in harmony with the architectural surroundings. A building on such a site ought to be ornamental to some extent, and so we have required its approval by the Fine Arts Commission, whose function it is to consider plans for public buildings and make them harmonize with their surroundings.

Mr. KENYON. It does seem to me that during these times the Treasury Department could get along, if necessary, with some plainer structure. It seems a little ridiculous, although my notions may be old fashioned, at a time like this, that we should in erecting buildings require that the plans be approved by the Commission of Fine Arts. Certainly facilities could be doubled up in the Treasury Department or a plainer building could be constructed, if necessary.

Mr. SWANSON. The department has already reported on that matter. If the Senator from Iowa will go to the Treasury Department he will find that the clerks there are out in the corridors. I am informed by the Health Department that that department is already crowded to a degree that violates the requirements of the rules of health.

I differ from the Senator as to the character of building that should be erected. I am not in favor of appropriating four or five hundred thousand dollars to construct temporary buildings. If we are going to construct a shack, we had better rent one. Unless we are going to spend our money on something which will be permanent, something the construction of which is really desirable, it will be a waste of money.

Mr. KENYON. How long will it take to construct this building?

Mr. SWANSON. The Secretary of the Treasury has stated that it could be constructed within a year.

If the Senator will allow me, I desire to say that I have no interest in this matter except a public interest. Every time the Appropriations Committee come in here and report an item for the payment of $1,000,000 rent for public buildings, as it will have to do during this war, there is criticism of the committee, and we are asked, "Why do you not bring in bills to construct buildings, so that the Government shall have no rent to pay in Washington?"

Mr. KENYON. I have no interest whatever in the matter. I am simply speaking for the great unrepresented portion of the American people.

Mr. SWANSON. The unrepresented portion of the American democracy are opposed to renting public buildings in Washington and enriching landlords. They are opposed to letting them erect private buildings on private land and letting the Government pay for the rent on that land, for the taxes on it, and for the buildings on it. We have here Government land upon which we can construct our own buildings more cheaply than we can rent from the landlords of Washington.

Mr. KENYON. The Government has buildings now which it is renting, one for a theater. It can certainly get the use of those buildings in this emergency.

Mr. SWANSON. The land was bought by a Republican Congress upon which to erect a Department of State and a Department of Justice. The appropriation for the land was made; $50,000 was appropriated for the plans; the plans were prepared, but the bill for the erection of the buildings never got through.

It is exceedingly difficult to secure the passage of a bill to put up public buildings in Washington, but it is easy to get through the Senate and the other House bills to erect handsome buildings in little towns all over this country. Such a proposition is scarcely opposed; but when we come here with a proposition to erect for the great Treasury Department—one of the great departments of this Nation—a building on the Government's own land, it is practically impossible to get the bill through the Senate. It is, I repeat, more easy to get bills through to erect a thousand or fifteen hundred little public buildings all over the country.

For one, as chairman of the committee, I have favored putting public buildings on Government land and not buying land for that purpose, and stopping the paying of high rents for buildings here in Washington.

Mr. PAGE. May I ask the Senator from Virginia one question?

Mr. KENYON. I have the floor, I think.

Mr. PAGE. Then, may I ask the Senator from Iowa does he understand that the proposition is to erect this building on land owned by the Government?

Mr. KENYON. The proposition is, as I understand, to construct it on land owned by the Government.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, this land has been owned by the United States since 1882. In 1882 the Government paid $250,000 for this land to put on it a public building. The proposition got through very easily when there was some one who had land to sell. The Government has held this land, as I have said, since 1882; it was bought for the purpose of erecting a public building on it, and now it is worth $575,000. This is simply a proposition to stop paying rent and to erect a building on the Government's own land.

Mr. PAGE. Where is the land located?

Mr. SWANSON. It is located opposite the Treasury Department and south of the Belasco Theater. It is proposed to erect this building there as a part of the Treasury Department. It will afford 100,000 square feet of space and will be connected by a subway with the Treasury Department.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Virginia will not get excited about this matter. He makes the same argument on every public-building proposition which comes along. Here is the Government owning many buildings, some of them used for theaters, some of them used for hotels, some of them used as headquarters by woman suffrage societies, that might just as well be used during the time of the war for the purposes on which the Senator is figuring.

Of course, I realize that, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] suggested, this is such a small amount it really ought not to be discussed here. When a bill was under consideration the other day we were told that $27,000,000 was such an infinitesimal sum that no one ought to say anything about it. Of course, this is a much less amount, but I insist that we can get along without the new public buildings of which the Senator speaks, which are spread all over the country. No public-building bill of the kind to which the Senator refers has passed the Senate for some little time, though such a bill did pass the other House providing for hundreds of public buildings. I think the chairman of the committee did not care to risk the bill on the floor of the Senate. That is the only thing I am suggesting. I do not do it in any controversial spirit.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not know what the Senator from Iowa means by saying I did not care to risk the bill on the floor of the Senate. I was opposed to a bill for erecting public buildings all over this country at this time.

Mr. KENYON. I am glad of that.

Mr. SWANSON. But I say that when the Government can save from $50,000 to $60,000 a year in rent and when the Government has bought and owns the land, it is very different from a public-building bill providing for the expenditure of $40,000,000 or $50,000,000 for the erection of public buildings one-third of which are not needed and if constructed will not be a saving to the Government.

I did not favor a public-building bill last year, and I do not favor one now, but the time has come when we have got to settle this problem in the city of Washington: Are we going to utilize the land the Government now owns? We have bought the land; we have paid for it; it is valuable. Shall we erect on it a public building such as is now contemplated or shall we abandon it and continue to rent? In our rentals we pay what? We pay for the land; we pay for the taxes on the land; we pay for insurance.

I am not one of those who believe that the Government, owning here a vast amount of real estate, can not afford to erect buildings on its own real estate and stop renting buildings from landlords here in Washington. For that reason, since I have been chairman of the committee I have contended that this is a most important question to settle in connection with the erection of public buildings. The great Treasury Department, which was one of the first departments of the Government to be organized, occupies a building which has not been enlarged since it was erected, in the time of Andrew Jackson. Its employees are scattered all over Washington. New duties have been imposed on it. The Farm Loan Board, the Federal Reserve Board, and the War Risk Board have been placed under its jurisdiction, and when you go there you find the employees are clear out in the corridors. The Department of Health says they are now too crowded, and yet when I come here with a proposition to construct a building, despite the present high prices, for forty-odd cents a square foot, when at the same time, as I can prove, the Government is paying for the Munsey Building and other buildings a dollar a square foot, some Senators seem to think that the Government is not rich enough to provide its own buildings. I say the taxpayers of this country are tired of enriching landowners in Washington. This Government is not so bankrupt that it can not afford to provide suitable accommodations for the conduct of its own business.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the taxpayers are tired of something, but I did not know it was the matter which the Senator has pointed out. The point I make, and which has not been answered, is this: The Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] has shown that it will cost 100 per cent more to erect this building now than it will after the war, provided prices then become anywhere near normal. That being true, with all the expenses which are necessarily piling up, it is a good deal of a farce to have attached to this bill a provision that the plans must be approved by the Commission of Fine Arts.

Mr. SWANSON. While it may be true that the cost of construction has gone up, at the same time rents are going up. If this Government is required to rent buildings for the next four or five years at the high rentals it will be obliged to pay, in five or six years those rentals would amount to nearly enough to construct a building of its own. Rents are going up in Washington at a great rate. I have a letter saying that the rental of some of the buildings now used for the Government will be advanced to $1.50 a square foot. There is nothing involved in this bill except a desire to see to it that the business of the Government is provided for and that the Government stops paying rent to landlords by utilizing land which was bought and paid for 35 years ago. It seems to me, if the Government is ever going to follow sensible business lines in connection with its buildings, this is as sensible a suggestion as can be presented to it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I am opposed to having the Fine Arts Commission interfere with the building proposed to be erected or with any of the public buildings erected in Washington. I am also utterly opposed to having private citizens erect buildings and rent them to the Government. I think those of us in charge of Government affairs ought to be ashamed of ourselves because of the rents the Government pays in this city.

Mr. BORAH. That is also true of individuals who come here.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, I do not agree with the Senator about that. They occupy an entirely different position, and rents for individuals are not especially high here. But the Government owns the land; it owns much more land than it needs for all the buildings it requires, and why should a private citizen put up a building for the Department of Justice, for instance, and rent it to the Government upon a basis that must necessarily pay him back in a few years what the building cost him?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume the Senator understands this is a war measure. I should like to ask him if he thinks this building will be completed before the war is over?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not discussing it as a war measure. I am using this opportunity to criticize what has been going on.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, let me ask the Senator, if he is not considering it as a war measure, does he not think that it is very inopportune to erect public buildings of this kind during the war, when construction costs more than in normal times and when the Government needs the money for other purposes?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not necessarily so. I think that the Government rent roll in the District of Columbia is a reflection upon all of us and an example of lack of business capacity in handling the affairs of the Government.

I repeat, the Government has the land; it has had it for years. I am not discussing simply this bill, but I happened to enter the Chamber, and am taking advantage of an opportunity to say something I have been wanting to say for some time, not with reference to this bill especially but generally.

On Pennsylvania Avenue there are a half dozen new buildings erected for the Government by private citizens. That condition is a shame; it is a reflection upon our business capacity. We can erect buildings as cheaply as private citizens can; we have the land, and why should we not put up our own buildings?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Wait a moment. I think one reason is the Fine Arts Commission. I am opposed to their interfering with our buildings. One reason why the Government has not gone ahead and provided itself suitable accommodations is that there has been an idea that every time the Government erected a building it must erect a monument to art to be seen and admired for all time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. Let me finish, please, and then I will yield the Senator the floor. I believe we ought, as business men, to adopt a sensible office-building plan to take care of the enlarging necessities of the Government, and whenever we need more space we should put up such a building, instead of having our rent roll expand, as it has since I have been in the Senate, from about $350,000 a year to nearly a million dollars, where I understand it now is. We ought to use the ground we own, and put up buildings costing, say, $500,000—neat, plain, simple office buildings, to meet the enlarging and increasing necessities of the various departments.

I will vote against the Fine Arts Commission having anything to do with this building; I will vote with the Senator from Iowa on that proposition; but I do believe that we ought to stop paying rent, and not allow private citizens to put up another building for the Government when we can erect buildings as cheaply as the individual and when we already have the ground.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. CALDER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield first to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator realizes, does he not, that this bill does not contemplate the construction of the kind of building he is advocating? The proposed building is to be ornamental in character, to correspond with the Treasury Department Building.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator, of course, understood me to say that I was opposed to the Fine Arts Commission having anything to do with it?

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think we would prevent the erection of that kind of building if the provision regarding the Fine Arts Commission were stricken out?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. You have it entirely in your power to determine the character of the building.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, I mean the Senate has.

Mr. NORRIS. The Secretary of the Treasury would have.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senate has.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the bill ought to be amended if the Senator's idea is to be carried out. I agree with the Senator in the main.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I stated to the Senator that I used this opportunity to say something that was in my system which I wanted to get rid of.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. I desire to ask the Senator from Georgia how it is in the power of the Senate to pass upon plans for any public building?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senate can specify the character of building; it can require the plans to be approved by it; it can specify, very briefly, the nature of the building; it can prescribe a type to correspond with office buildings erected in the cities.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator will allow me, as I understand, the function of Congress usually appertains to appropriations of the amount to be expended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have an idea that Congress has some additional authority, although I may be mistaken.

Mr. HARDING. Does the Senator think it practical for Congress to specify the plans for public buildings?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do. It could specify an office-building type, acording to the ordinary standards of office buildings.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator refers to the Fine Arts Commission. I am surprised that he should object to having the Fine Arts Commission pass upon the character of the architecture, the beauty of the architecture. We have always discussed the city of Washington as a place of magnificent distances. Is it not a proper thing, is it not the best thing in the long run for this city, that there should be a Fine Arts Commission to pass upon every public building erected?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No. I will say to the Senator that I have been here for six years hearing that story, and what has happened? Additional buildings have been constructed by private citizens and the rentals paid by the Government have increased from about $350,000 a year to nearly a million dollars. That is what it has meant. It has been said, "Let us wait until we can erect a great, ornamental building of exquisite architecture"; but the building has not been erected by the Government, and in the meantime we have paid hundreds of thousands of dollars to the landlords from whom the Government rents, who continue to erect building after building for use by the Government.

Mr. CALDER. If the Senator will permit me, has not that been the policy of the present administration?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. CALDER. If I have been properly informed, the Department of Commerce, the Department of the Interior, the Department of Labor, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Navy Annex, and the building of the Civil Service Commission have all been constructed and rented under the present administration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think the new building of the Department of the Interior is a rented building.

Mr. CALDER. I mentioned the new Interior Department Building, but perhaps I was wrong about that.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I desire to say that I introduced a bill to construct buildings for the Department of Justice and the Department of State on the land bought by the Government opposite the Willard Hotel, contiguous to the Treasury. These buildings would have relieved the State, War, and Navy Department of some of the congestion now in evidence there. The Government paid for the land upon which those buildings were to be erected, and they paid $50,000 for plans for the buildings, which plans were approved. I sought to have that bill passed, but it was defeated repeatedly. Consideration was refused it on the objection of the former Senator from Ohio, Mr. Burton, the former Senator from New York, Mr. Root, and others.

As chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I desire to say that whenever a vote has been taken, it has been found that a majority of Senators on the other side of the Chamber have voted against constructing such buildings. I hope that will not be so in this case, but ever since I have been chairman of the committee there have been some Members on the Democratic side who were strong for public buildings in their local communities, and who frequently criticized me for not bringing before the Senate public-buildings bills, who united with a large number of the Republicans to defeat every proposition that has been brought forth to construct buildings on Government land for Government uses in Washington, instead of spending thousands of dollars in rent and filling the pockets of the landlords of this city. I hope Senators will stand by me on this matter.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I must leave in a moment. I only came up at the ringing of the bells to vote, not expecting to take any part in the debate, but I could not forbear to use the opportunity to express a criticism which I have been inwardly indulging about the silly, extravagant policy which we have pursued in regard to our public buildings. One of the troubles has been that whenever it has been proposed to put up a sane office building for the Government, we have been told that the judgment of the Fine Arts Commission or some other tribunal must be followed or that some peculiar and expensive system of architecture must be employed; and so, instead of constructing buildings for the Government, we have allowed private citizens to erect nice plain office buildings which are seen in the city just as much as if they belonged to the Government.

Mr. CALDER rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am going to yield the floor entirely to the Senator from New York in a moment, for I must go to the Finance Committee, as I promised to return at once. I hope, however, Senators will get out of the idea that we must have a great monumental architectural structure every time we put up an office annex for the Government, and that we will adopt the sane policy of erecting practical office buildings upon ground owned by the Government, which will economically provide for the Government, and stop running up inexcusable rent accounts, which now amount to nearly $1,000,000, as I understand.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will yield the floor to the Senator.

Mr. PAGE. I merely want to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Very well.

Mr. PAGE. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] says that the land upon which it is proposed to erect this building is land which the Government has owned for 35 years, and I take it for granted that it is the site near the Belasco Theater. For one, I want to say that I think I am as much of an economist as is the Senator from Georgia, but I am totally and heartily opposed to erecting on that corner, directly opposite the Treasury Department Building and contiguous to the White House, in a locality where every building is an object of art, a cheap, ordinary, office-style of structure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I answer, Mr. President, that the ordinary office building is not cheap and is not lacking in harmony. The ordinary office building beautifies the streets of New York and beautifies the streets of Boston. Near the Shoreham Hotel there are a number of handsome office buildings, and a building of such character erected on the corner now proposed to be utilized would not be inharmonious and would be amply satisfying, I think, to the eyes of all except the extremely fastidious, or those who wish to be their Government's landlords.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator from Connecticut want the floor for himself or to ask me a question?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am through.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am not a member of the committee that reported this bill, and perhaps am not so well qualified to speak about it as those who have heard the evidence, but I do carry in my mind the location where it is proposed to erect this building, and, from the dimensions given in the report of the committee, 136 feet on one street and 186 on the other, being at the corner of Madison Place and Pennsylvania Avenue, it would give 25,296 square feet of ground space. The report does not indicate how many stories high it is intended to carry the building, but it estimates that there would be available 100,000 square feet of office floor space. I presume that is after deducting hallways and the dimensions of the interior walls, and that the building would probably be three or four stories high, judging from the square feet of the ground area.

But, Mr. President, I am moved to say just a word in relation to this bill, because, having read the report, it is perfectly evident to me that the Treasury Department, whose duties are increasing by leaps and bounds, needs more space. The principal question which confronts us is whether we will divide up the additional force that they are all the time being compelled to acquire to meet the duties we are imposing upon them and scatter them about in old private dwellings and private buildings throughout the city, or whether we will utilize land that the Government has now held since 1882, a period of some 35 years, and erect a building designed for the purposes and uses of the Treasury Department, the operating cost of which will be forever much less than would be the cost if they are compelled to hire a half dozen different buildings and split their force up; and, if so, whether we can make sure that it shall be built to comport with the surroundings.

I would heartily agree with the statement of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] that if a building were to be erected in some other part of the city, in a neighborhood where the buildings are of simple factory or office construction, it would be an unwise expenditure of money to make it subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission of Fine Arts. But I entirely agree with what the Senator from Vermont said. It is universally admitted that the old Treasury Building in the city of Washington is the finest example of pure Grecian art that there is in the country. Where the Government is the proprietor, to put right across the street from that beautiful building, with its monolith granite columns, which will stand there forever, a building merely calculated to protect a certain number of employees from the weather, a mere brick building, or a building with no artistic finish at all, it seems to me among educated men—and we all pretend to be men of some artistic appreciation—would be a public calamity.

In the first place, the services of the Commission of Fine Arts are free to the Government, as I understand. The interior arrangement being the same, it seems to me beyond question that the additional cost of having a decent exterior, approved by men who have the confidence of everybody, to whose judgment anybody would submit if they were to erect a beautiful country seat for themselves or any building where art and beauty were to have any attention at all paid to them, would be a mighty small percentage of the cost of the building. It would be merely a few columns, a few ideas of design.

To have anything placed at that corner, which we all know so well, next to the Belasco Theater, and about which we have all inquired, when we came to Washington, why such a beautiful location continued to remain vacant—to have anything put there about which every stranger who came to town would say, "How in the world does it happen that in the National Capital, where we are attempting by a slight additional expenditure of public funds to set a standard for the whole Nation for art and beauty, to make this the model city beautiful, a structure has been erected there that stands out like a sore thumb, incompatible with all its surroundings?" and to have to answer, "Well, Congress thought that the Fine Arts Commission were a set of faddists, or that the Government buildings ought to be built upon the factory plan and severely plain, and it would cost a little more to build it so that it would be a thing of beauty instead of a thing of monstrosity," would be a humiliation for any of us.

I believe, as it lies in my mind, that there is a well-built building immediately adjoining this proposed site on the east. Then comes the Riggs Bank, which itself has a beautiful front, and then the American Security & Trust Co. Building—all buildings of artistic merit, with fine granite columns, and all buildings, I have no doubt, designed with some respect and some attention to the old Treasury Building. Right in the neighborhood, too, there is a magnificent new hotel going up. I believe it is called the Hotel Washington.

If we are going to have this building at all on that site, there can not be any question that it ought to be subjected to some artistic supervision; and while the Senator from Georgia suggests that we can prescribe what sort of artistic effect would be most acceptable in that place, that is an impossible suggestion. While I have a certain degree of artistic perception myself and admire things of beauty, I am not a creator of them; and when the Senators think it over calmly I doubt if they would be willing to submit such a proposition to anybody in the Senate. We are not specialists in that line. We can all admire a beautiful oil painting, but very few of us could reproduce it or suggest the lines upon which it should be created.

For that reason, Mr. President, I hope very much that if the bill is to pass, this provision subjecting it to the approval of the Commission of Fine Arts will remain in the bill. Although we are spending a great deal of money on war measures and it is not pleasurable to have to spend another million dollars or a million and a quarter just at this time for this building, we must realize that it is not a question of spending the amount or saving it.

The question is, Shall we spend it in a way in which it will be of permanent and enduring use to the Government, or shall we spend it in such a way that after a few years we will have to lose a great deal of the amount that we have appropriated?

The report of the committee states that the increased number of employees necessitated in the Department of the Treasury by the additional duties that we have imposed upon them, and are continuing to impose, is 300 additional employees in connection with the liberty bond issue alone, and 300 more on some other duties we have imposed upon them, and more on the next issue of liberty bonds. The Secretary states that this has been somewhat necessitated by the great duties cast upon the department growing out of the great war we are entering upon. He also states, or the committee states, and I assume from evidence before the committee that these increased officials and clerks in the department will not all vanish when the war closes; that many of these duties will have to be kept up. They also state the amount of money they are paying now to private parties for disassociated locations, when the whole business of the department would be much better conducted if they were coordinated and more closely held together.

For those reasons, Mr. President, I feel that I shall support this bill, and I hope the provision in regard to the Fine Arts Commission will be left in it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have not thus far been convinced that I ought to give my support to this appropriation of a million and a quarter dollars for the erection of this building during this war, while we are so badly in need of funds; but I very much hope that if the bill is to pass it will contain this amendment, which provides that the plans for the building shall be submitted to the Fine Arts Commission. I feel as strongly as the Senator from Connecticut does about that question.

Mr. President, it is an unfortunate thing that many, many years ago the buildings which were constructed in Washington were not all submitted to a fine arts commission. If we will just go about this town and look at some of the Government buildings that were put up at unfortunate periods in the development of architecture, without any relation to the buildings in their neighborhood, I am sure we will all regret that some standardization of architectural design was not enforced at an earlier period. One has only to remember the Post Office Building, that gray monstrosity that sits down upon Pennsylvania Avenue, and will be there, presumably, for two or three hundred years to come, a sight that can never be avoided by any American citizen visiting the National Capital and seeking to stroll down or up Pennsylvania Avenue. We can think of the Pension Office Building, this red tomb over here that desecrates a park, with no more artistic beauty to it and no more right to exist in a National Capital in that particular place than a great factory building with a tall chimney arising from it; and we can think of other buildings of the same type that unfortunately sprang up and became stationary, as it were, within the limits of the National Capital.

For one, Mr. President, I have been somewhat dismayed at the tendency in recent years to house the departments of the Government in so-called office buildings. I know they are cheaper. I know perhaps the elevators in them run faster. I know that perhaps you can get more clerks in the same cubic space than you can get in a so-called monumental building. I am somewhat dismayed at the suggestion made upon the floor this afternoon that an office building, such as we have in the city of New York by the hundreds, is an object of beauty, or that the office buildings in the city of Boston are objects of beauty. I can not agree with that contention. They turn our streets into canyons. In the case of an office building there is nothing that suggests the fact that a great Government is occupying it. There is nothing monumental in their character. I hope, if this bill is to pass, that any and every building erected under its terms, or under any other bill that is brought in here for the erection of a Government building in Washington, at least, before it is put up shall be submitted, so far as its plans and its architectural design are concerned, to a fine arts commission of some kind that shall pass upon it, and prevent this Capital City of the United States being desecrated by buildings which have no place here, and which, were they to be placed anywhere else, would be taken merely as common, commercial office buildings that were to be put up for ordinary purposes.

I do not think the National Capital should be characterized by such buildings, built by the Government upon its own ground. I think the Government should put up the handsomest buildings that the ground can contain. I for one am willing to spend a hundred thousand or two hundred thousand dollars more for a building and be satisfied that the people of the United States, when they come here to visit this city, will regard it as a thing of beauty.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, this is an interesting and an important subject.

I quite agree with what I have heard said this afternoon with relation to the construction of buildings for occupancy by the Government in the District of Columbia, and I hope that a systematic plan will be followed to carry out the provisions of the original plan to develop the city of Washington. While it might be practicable to have an ordinary office building for certain purposes, it does seem to me that, generally speaking, we can afford to erect in Washington buildings of great architectural merit, and I am glad the Senator from Virginia has inserted in this proposition a reference to the Fine Arts Commission. Indeed, that is one of the best things in the bill. We ought to have a systematic plan of character of the buildings to be erected, and only by reference to a competent commission can that be brought about.

I think we have been lax in Congress. I am not sure but that it is up to the majority, during the last three or four or five years, if we have not carried out the plans which have been perfected for the improvement of the location between Pennsylvania Avenue and Fourteenth and Fifteenth Streets. The Government owns a large area there, covered by buildings of no importance, and it is the natural place for the beginning of the systematic development of that area south of Pennsylvania Avenue. I wish that years ago we had adopted plans which were approved by a very competent commission of architects, and had erected there buildings which would be useful at this time or useful at any other time.

I think the Government, as a matter of economy, should, generally speaking, erect its own buildings and manage them in the District of Columbia. I think it would be cheaper than to have buildings erected, as they have been during the last three or four years, by individuals, on a basis which means, of course, considerable profit to them, and which would necessarily mean that the Government could do it on a more economical basis. That is to say, the rates of interest would be very much less.

Personally I do not approve of developing this particular site, and if I had the entire power in the matter I would sell the lot on which it is proposed to erect this building. The Senator from Virginia said it could be sold for perhaps $600,000, or that, perhaps, was its value, which is practically three times what it originally cost.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it can not be sold at any price with the conditions that were imposed as to the character of the building that should be put there. The prospective purchasers have refused to consider any sale that will not permit them to put up an immense office building, or something of that kind. I do not think the Government could consent to have an ordinary, common building put up there even by a private individual. As the Senator says, some architects say that the Treasury Department is the finest building we have here; and we have either got to use this site or let it remain vacant. We can not sell it for anything, unless we allow private individuals to put up any kind of a building there.

Mr. WEEKS. I agree that if a building is to be erected there it should be of suitable character for that neighborhood. It is in about the most conspicuous part of Washington, and, in my judgment, it would be a great mistake to erect an unsightly building on that particular location; and yet I would greatly prefer to expend the money on the site south of Pennsylvania Avenue between Fourteenth and Fifteenth Streets.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, that site was bought for a building for the State Department and the Department of Justice. The money was paid for it for that purpose.

Mr. WEEKS. And the Department of Commerce.

Mr. WARREN. And it was intended, at least, to take in the Geological Survey.

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; but suitable plans were prepared and the Government paid the money for them. It paid $50,000 for the plans to the architect who prepared the most beautiful plans. The money was paid and the plans were adopted. I introduced a bill, and the committee unanimously reported it, to erect the building. If we had it now the Army and Navy Departments would not have to be paying a whole lot of rent that they pay now. The State Department could have moved out, and we would have avoided paying these excessively high rents that we are paying now for the Army and Navy. But I could not get the bill considered. It is nearly impossible to get these bills considered unless you load them down with a general public-building bill for every little village in the country.

I agree with the Senator; but, you see, the Treasury Department needs 100,000 square feet of floor space. It is now renting 67,000 square feet. This will give the 100,000 square feet. The Treasury Department has asked for 37,000 square feet more space. It is already renting 67,000, which makes a total of 105,000. If this building is erected the Treasury Department will not need to rent any space at all. This is the only place where the Treasury Department could be enlarged. The purpose is to have an underground passage. Then it will be a part of the Treasury Department as much as if it were immediately adjoining it. This is the only place I know of where the Treasury Department could be enlarged.

I have seen the plan of the building. It seems to me to be in accord with the Treasury Department and also with the Riggs Bank Building. I agree with the Senator that a building ought not to be put up there that is not in accord with the White House architecture, the Treasury Department, and the Riggs Bank Building, and for that reason I thought that amendment ought to be put on.

Mr. WEEKS. There is one other point to which I want to call attention. I have not any idea that this building can be completed within a year, or that it will be completed within a year; and necessarily it will cost from 25 to 50 per cent more than it would in ordinary times. If it were possible to have this building erected next week or next month, there might be some excuse, I think, for the very large increase in the cost of its erection; but as it is not possible to do that, in my judgment, within 18 months, when in all probability—at least, we hope so—the war will be over, and conditions will have returned to normal, it does not seem to me entirely wise to undertake the erection of the building at this time. But I hope the Senator from Virginia will pursue the course to which he now seems to be pointing, to have erected in the city of Washington suitable buildings, suitable in number and size, to supply the governmental needs. I am confident it will be economy, and that it will add greatly to the character of the city.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to say only a few words.

I am somewhat familiar with this proposed site. We had a pretty fair four-story brick building there, which some years ago was occupied by the Department of Justice. It was our own building. All at once the report was given out that that building was unsafe and insanitary, and it was torn down. It was a pretty good building, a four-story building. I had occasion to go there several times to consult the Department of Justice. They finally succeeded in tearing down the building, and then they went and rented a residence north of one of the parks in the city for the Department of Justice, that they have occupied ever since. I always thought that it was a great waste to pull down a building that the department could as well have occupied, simply for the purpose of moving them into a private residence.

In respect to this matter of architectural design, I entirely concur with the Senators from Connecticut and Massachusetts. There are only three or four public buildings in this city that have any pretensions to real architecture. The White House is one of them. The Treasury Department is another. The old Interior Department, or what they call the Patent Office, is the best of all, and the building across from there. The Patent Office has the most beautiful Grecian Doric columns that I have ever seen anywhere, and the Treasury Department comes next with its other columns, which I believe belong to the Ionic style, and also the old Post Office Building, now occupied by a part of the War Department

It seems to me that this building, if the Treasury Department needs it, ought to be erected on this very site, for one or two reasons.

In the first place, it is so near the Treasury Department, and an underground passage can be easily made to communicate with the old building, so as to make them practically one. We have had some experience here with what a great help it is to have the underground passage between the Capitol and the Senate Office Building. The distance from the north end of the Treasury Department across Pennsylvania Avenue to this site is very short, and a good underground passageway would make it very convenient.

When you come to the matter of architecture, a building erected there ought to be erected in harmony with the Treasury Department and the White House. I do not know how other Senators feel about it, but a few years ago I made a trip to Europe, I saw some of the palaces there, and I came back here with a higher admiration for the White House than I had ever had before. The White House is of the most chaste and most perfect style of architecture, and I hope it will not be destroyed or injured or tampered with in any way.

This building to be erected here, being so near the White House and so near the Treasury Building—the two buildings that come nearest to the Grecian school of architecture and to perfection in that line—ought to be in harmony with those buildings. To put up an ordinary office building, like some of these office buildings, would mar the appearance both of the Treasury Building and of the White House.

I have never been enamored with the site that we were forced to purchase some years ago south of the Avenue. It is rather low ground. It is not quite so low as that monstrosity of the Post Office Department, but it is low ground. It sags down south and southeast from the corner of the Treasury Department. Now, there may be room for a State Department building there. I have always felt that the Department of Justice, with the law library and the Supreme Court, ought to be in one building, and that that building ought to be right here opposite the Congressional Library. We want the law library here near us. The Supreme Court have small quarters. If you go into the law library, you will see how confined they are. To my mind, the proper way would be to house the Supreme Court, our law library, and the Department of Justice under one roof; and I think the appropriate place, instead of going into that swampy hollow southeast of the Treasury Department, would be up here on Capitol Hill.

They talk about beautifying the city! That would complete the beautification of this square here. We have on the southeast the House Office Building and on the northeast we have the Senate Office Building and out in this direction we have the Congressional Library. If we should fill this other space, we would have the Capitol surrounded on three sides with suitable and proper buildings.

The Congressional Library is a building that is not only useful but is a work of art in itself. No one can criticize that. So I trust that if the new Treasury Building is to be built it will be built just where the Senator from Virginia proposes that it shall be built; but I further trust that when it comes to the erection of a Department of Justice building that building, including the law library and quarters for the Supreme Court, will be built up here near the two Houses of Congress, opposite the Congressional Library. It has no business down in that swamp hole there, that rough, harum-scarum part of the city.

One thing that has discouraged me a good deal has been to see, in the city here, how when people had a lot of property that was not exactly in good order and was not paying good rent, but was a sort of a dead and worthless property, they would manage to unload it on the Government. Now, look at all this space, a lot of it, between here and the depot. A lot of good buildings were torn down—for what? To make a park between here and the Union Depot. They might have had a limited park, but they extended it in front of the Southern Railway office, and extended it down in this direction. Before long there will be another drive made on Congress to take a couple of more squares down here "to round it out," as they call it, and make it perfect.

We had in this Chamber a Senator from the West who had a grand scheme, and that was to have all the Government buildings built in a row on the south side of Pennsylvania Avenue; to have them erected there like a line of Lombardy poplars in that swampy ground where the Tiber, in olden times, before it was covered with pavement, discharged its waters into the Potomac. The remnant of that project was the acquisition—and, thank God, it was limited to that—of those three or four squares next to the Treasury Department. There is a hotel there, there is a theater, and God knows what else there is in that locality; but we acquired that years ago, and perhaps we ought to utilize it for some of the departments; perhaps for the Department of Commerce, who are in that artistic building—no; not artistic, but that building which approximates to a skyscraper down on Pennsylvania Avenue. Perhaps suitable quarters could be found for them there.

Yesterday I called at the Department of Justice, and, much to my astonishment, I found they had vacated the residence that they occupied after they had torn down the brick building on the site next to the Riggs Bank. I found that they had gone into new quarters, and I ventured to state what happened in the case of the Census Office Building and had happened in that great building here on G street once occupied by the Post Office Department. When they succeed in getting the Government to enter into a contract to put up a building and rent it they generally get enough out of it to pay for the cost of the building in one or two years, and then they have the stuff left on their hands, and they always manage to load it on the Government.

As I go down here on the cars on the line that runs in front of Judiciary Square, as they call it, there is a building that is a sort of a stray building. It used to be occupied by the District government. Then I believe they managed to get it used as a sort of bureau or place for medical supplies, and I believe they have got some other department housed there now; at least there is a Government sign in front of it. What rent they pay I do not know.

Senators talk about beautifying the city. I am heartily in favor of it, but, Mr. President, I think we have allowed the real estate men in Washington to work the Government beyond all rime and reason. I hope my good friend from Virginia, now that he has stepped into the breach, will put a stop to this acquisition of dead and down property for the sake of relieving the owners, and stick to good high ground.

Let me call your attention to another matter. What use was there in putting the District Building down in that swampy country? It was nothing but a swamp, as you will see by looking at an old map of Washington. It ought to have been built upon Judiciary Square, where there is high, good ground. But the street car company had an old abandoned power house there. It had been burned and destroyed and the ground was saddled on the Government. The District Building was built there at great expense, for it takes a good deal of money to get a foundation in a swampy piece of land like that.

Take the building where the Post Office Department is. It puts me in mind of one of those old feudal castles that were built for an army of retainers and built as a matter of defense. It was built down there in the swamp. It must have taken a mint of money to obtain a proper foundation. I was told it was built there because two of the leading newspapers of the city fronted on that street and were very anxious to have that feudal castle built right in front of them. They got what they wanted, but the Government, in my opinion, was left in the lurch. If we could dispose of that building for some other purpose and get the Post Office Department on high and dry ground, it would be a great benefit to the people.

Mr. President, perhaps I have straggled and wandered on this question. In the matter of architecture and the work of the Fine Arts Commission you may think it strange that a rural chap like me, a farmer, should have any such notions; but I entirely agree with the views of the Senator from Connecticut, the Senator from Virginia, and the Senator from Massachusetts that whatever buildings we construct hereafter ought to be buildings of architectural beauty and not mere skyscrapers, and above all that it is important when we erect structures near the old Treasury Department and near the White House that those structures should be in harmony with those two best specimens of our architecture.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, so that there may be no danger of my attitude being misunderstood, I want to say that I am in favor of the committee amendment. I agree to a great extent with what has been said by the Senator from Connecticut and other Senators in regard to the erection of a building at this particular place. I would not be opposed under ordinary conditions to the appropriation of money for the erection of the kind of a building that is proposed at that place. I think it would be a mistake in this particular locality where it is proposed to erect this building that we should erect a skyscraper. Of course, it ought to correspond with the Treasury Building. My opposition comes not from that but from the fact that at this particular time we ought not to be erecting buildings of that kind. It is conceded that it is to be ornamental. It is conceded that it will not be higher than the Treasury Building. It will not be an office building. As far as financial economy is concerned, it would not meet that kind of a specification, even in time of peace, when we were not so hard pushed for funds. But now we are called upon to appropriate money for the necessities of this war that stagger the imagination. Every citizen, every man, woman, and child, has been importuned from the White House, by every public official, by every newspaper, to economize in every direction. We are asked to eat less. We are asked even to wear our clothes longer. We are asked to eat certain kinds of food as a matter of economy. I have not criticized any propaganda of that kind. It has my entire approval and sympathy. I am trying to carry out in my weak way in my individual capacity those theories. I think as a patriotic duty we owe it to our country, to the men who have to foot the bills, and we owe it out of respect to the men who are going to give up their lives for our cause that we economize in every possible direction.

We are confronted now in the midst of that condition with a proposition from the committee to construct a monumental building for whom? For the Treasury Department, presided over by the son-in-law of the President. From all these men has gone forth the proclamation to everybody, economize, save, do not be extravagant, cut down what you eat, even to what you wear, make last year's machine do for this year's, if you are a farmer, and wear last year's suit and last year's shoes. But the Secretary of the Treasury, with his department right next to the White House itself, will utilize a million and a quarter of this money that we are getting from the hard-worked taxpayers of our country to build a monument of beauty in order that his working force may work in marble halls and at mahogany desks.

Mr. President, that is all wrong, in my judgment. The moral effect of it is wrong. The Secretary of the Treasury is the last man in the United States who ought to ask this. No one man, unless it is the President himself, ought to be more careful about economy now than he, and if he does ask it we ought to decline to comply with his request. It is not right; it is not fair.

If we construct a building at this place, as I said, it ought to correspond, and it will, with the Treasury Building. I am not finding fault with that. Although I have no expert knowledge, I concede, for the sake of the argument, at least, that the experts are right. They say that the Treasury Building is a beautiful specimen of art. I have noticed that beauty in architecture in recent years runs to low buildings, and I can not help but think that that means more buildings. That is more work for the architect. Low buildings will not house as many working people as tall buildings, and hence it just happens—I presume it is a coincidence—that the artistic eye of the architect demands low buildings and more buildings and more work for the architect.

The style of architecture, I think to some extent, is like women's dresses. It changes from year to year.

Senators have taken occasion to make fun of the old Post Office Building, now used by the Post Office Department, down on Pennsylvania Avenue. They call it a monstrosity. It is built out of granite; it is fireproof; it has one of the most beautiful courts in the center I have ever seen and the largest American flag that ever was made. All the workers there are safe from destruction from wind or storm or fire if they are inside of that building. It has not a crack in it from the top of the fifth floor to the bottom of the basement below. It was considered a beauty several years ago. Now it is a monstrosity. If you would take off of it three stories and leave it two stories high, I have no doubt it would be an architectural beauty. It is constructed of the same material as the two wings of the Treasury Department and is better constructed than the main part of the Treasury Building, which is not strictly fireproof. It was constructed out of sandstone, and only a few years ago we paid $250,000 to put an outside granite facing on the Treasury Building. The immense structure that is on top of the building, that appears to be a stone fence around the top of it, it was discovered then was nothing but wood.

And yet that is a building that is perfect! We have to run under the street and take part of the next block to get enough room for the Treasury officials to work, when if that building was as high as this monstrosity down on Pennsylvania Avenue it would accommodate twice the number of people that this new building that you contemplate would accommodate.

Mr. President, it would not do for me to say that I thought the old Post Office Building was a nice-looking building, but I happened to have in charge a few weeks ago a party of gentlemen and ladies from the great city of New York. If they had been from my State, you probably would not pay much attention to their opinion on art, but they were from New York, from the very place where the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] lives, who expresses the opinion that this building is a monstrosity. They were unable to find the New York Senators. I found them accidentally and showed them around the Capitol and took them out on the west side and pointed out the public buildings. I pointed out the different buildings that I thought they ought to see. The next day, after they had been around, they called on me. It is just a coincidence; I remember very distinctly that they commented particularly on this old monstrosity. I had asked them to go up in that building and look over that beautiful court where the mail of the Capital City used to be distributed and handled before we built a two-story building for the post office in the city of Washington, and one that met the views of architects and artists. It is peculiar that these New Yorkers thought that the most beautiful building that they had been inside of. It was a remarkable building, they thought. I have heard the expression of hundreds of people to the effect that the old Post Office Building is a beauty. When those visitors from New York had examined it they thought it was not only beautiful but it was remarkably useful, well constructed, without a flaw and without an error.

I agree—although when I say that I agree I have to confess I am not artistic—I agree with the Senator from Georgia when he says that we might construct buildings like office buildings for some of the employees of the Government with economy and without injury to the Government or to the employees. I conceive that we ought not to do it at this particular time; but one of the finest working buildings that the Government owns is the new Interior Department Building.

That is something like an office building, and they house three times as many people there without any inconvenience as they do in some of these large structures that are exhibitions of beauty and art, where in order to do any business you have to wander around one corridor and another until you are almost lost in a maze of architectural beauty. That does not help out any in the real work. I believe if we had more buildings like that one, more buildings, for instance, like the Southern Building, the office building down here, properly located, we would save money for the Government and at the same time we would not mar the sensibilities of any citizen anywhere who came to the Capital to see the sights. So I agree with the Senator from Georgia along that line. But I do not believe the Senator from Georgia would want to construct that kind of a building at this particular place.

Mr. President, we have a proposition before us now that is not practicable. As the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] said, we own the building near the corner of the Treasury Building and we own three blocks of buildings there. One of them at least is five or six stories high. We could cut the hotel building into office rooms. As he says, they have all kinds of structures there. He said God only knows what they are; God might not know just exactly all that the Government does own in that vicinity or what is located there. We ought to occupy the buildings now during this war and save rent. The expenditure of this million and a quarter dollars to erect this building will not help the war conditions one iota. It is labeled a war measure, but it has not anything more to do with the war proposition than the flowers that bloomed last spring. The war will be over before this building is constructed. The Senator from Virginia says that the Secretary of the Treasury thinks he can build it in a year. It is well that he said the Secretary thought he could do it. I give it as my judgment they will not have the first shovelful of dirt turned in a year if we pass this bill to-day.

Everybody who has seen the Government construct buildings knows that it does not do it in that way. It will be two or three years before this building will be ready to be occupied. If we want to be patriotic and economical, it seems to me we could just as well occupy such buildings as we now own, or rent quarters for Treasury officials for the time being, if necessary—and I concede that it is necessary. The passing of this bill, however, will not relieve that situation. We shall have to rent just as many buildings and to have just as much space as though we did not pass the bill, for the emergency of the war will have passed, as everybody really knows, before this building will be constructed.

We ought to be able to do and we shall have to do a great many things in the way of economy, governmental and otherwise, before this war is over. Now, when we are hunting means of raising money, instead of passing appropriations like this carrying a million and a quarter dollars to construct a building which will not be erected until the war is over and which, if it could be erected to-morrow, would still be extravagant, so far as any war conditions are concerned, we ought to be willing to put some of the clerks in the corridors, if necessary. If the clerks are patriotic, they will not object to that. While we are asking the women of the country to save food, while we are asking the people of the country to eat corn bread, while we are asking the children of the country to wear last year's shoes, it is not too much to ask, in the same patriotic spirit, some of the clerks and some of the officials—the Secretary of the Treasury himself, if necessary—to have offices in the corridor. The corridor is better than the offices they had before they came here. Mr. President, let them work on ordinary tables, if necessary. Let us be economical in the affairs of Government, the same as we ask the people to be economical. Let them use beer kegs for tables, if it is necessary [laughter]—empty beer kegs, I mean. There will be lots of empty beer kegs when the prohibition law goes into effect.

We must economize in every way; we can not ask the people of the country to economize unless the men who are at the head of the Government will agree also to economize. If the appeal of the President to the people to be economical is effective, as I hope it may be, and if the appeal of the food director, Mr. Hoover, to the people to prevent waste and to economize has the proper effect, as I hope it will have, then the President and his son-in-law, the Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Hoover, and all the others ought to practice officially what they preach that the citizens of the country should do privately.

Therefore, Mr. President, this bill ought to be defeated. I am not opposed to this amendment—I am in favor of this particular amendment—but the bill itself ought to be defeated. We ought to construct specimens of architecture and beauty when we have money that comes without the great effort that is going to be made by our people in order to make the necessary contributions to keep this Government on its feet and to carry the war to a successful issue.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Virginia that I have no particular desire to delay the bill. I realize that it is an appropriation bill, and probably can not be defeated; but I should like to ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the bill, and I suppose it is impossible to get that at this time.

Mr. SWANSON. We can have a yea-and-nay vote, and if a quorum is not developed we can adjourn.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say to the Senator that I have no intention of delaying the bill. I am willing to vote now, so far as I am concerned, but we must have a roll call.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator can ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which I transfer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES of Washington (when his name was called). The junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is necessarily absent. I am paired with him for the afternoon, and therefore withhold my vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. ROBINSON's name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] and vote "yea."

Mr. SAULSBURY (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], which I transfer to the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARDING (after having voted in the negative). I notice that the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with whom I have a pair, has not voted. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. STERLING (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. VARDAMAN (after having voted in the negative). I desire to inquire if the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BRADY] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have a general pair with that Senator and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. PENROSE (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], with whom I have a general pair, has not voted. I transfer my pair with that Senator to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and let my vote stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this question a quorum has not voted.

Mr. SWANSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, under the order previously made, until Saturday, August 4, 1917, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, August 2, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father who art in heaven, source of every high and noble impulse, quicken our minds and hearts by Thy holy influence, that we may go forward with the new day to greater conquests and victories for ourselves and for our Republic; that the world may be a little better that we have lived and wrought; and Thine be the praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SMALL presented a conference report and statement of the House conferees on the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors and for other purposes, which were ordered to be printed under the rule.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 17. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD AND FUEL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the House for a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, it has been impossible for the clerks of the committee to get the conference report on the food-control bill ready for presentation at this moment. There is a full agreement of the conferees. I am satisfied that we can be ready to present the report and statement in the course of an hour. We have had a good deal of difficulty in finding members of the conference committee, in order to get their signatures to the report and statement. They are scattered over the city, engaged in departmental and other official business, and this has delayed the matter to some extent. In order to save the House from recessing, I ask unanimous consent that I may file this report and statement during the day, and that they be printed in the RECORD in the usual way; and I give notice that I will call up the report for consideration to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. LEVER] asks unanimous consent that he may have the privilege of handing to the proper clerk the conference report and statement on the food-control bill this afternoon, and that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and that he call it up to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman if he has any information as to how much discussion there will be upon this report when it comes up in the regular way to-morrow?

Mr. LEVER. I should think that there would not be any very great demand for any long discussion. My own thought would be to use the usual hour, and to move the previous question at the end of that time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is a very urgent desire——

Mr. LEVER. Of course I would not do that if there is any general demand for more discussion.

The SPEAKER. That is for the House to decide.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There is an earnest desire on the part of many Members to finish this matter to-morrow, if possible, in order to get away by the close of the week. I think it would cater to the wishes of most of the Members if the river and harbor bill could be taken up by unanimous consent to-day. I do not know whether there would be any objection to that. That would leave the way clear for the consideration of the food-bill conference report to-morrow.

Mr. LEVER. Besides the river and harbor bill and the food-control bill, there is the food-survey bill, which is still in conference, but which I think may be ready to report to-morrow morning; and I think we may get unanimous consent to take it up to-morrow.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Unless you did ask unanimous consent, as you have done in the case of the food-control bill, we would be held over again until the end of the week.

Mr. FOSS. I want to ask the gentleman if this report of the conferees will be a unanimous consent?

Mr. LEVER. The report that we shall present to-day?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. LEVER. It will be unanimous with the exception of one senatorial conferee.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, still reserving the right to object, I desire to say to the gentleman, without any authority whatever to make the suggestion, that it has been urged that unanimous consent be had for the consideration of the river and harbor bill to-day, which would clear the decks for action on the food bill to-morrow.

Mr. LEVER. That is a matter over which I have no control. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] would handle that situation. What I was trying to do in my request was to avoid the necessity of taking a recess, which would be necessary in order to submit the report in the regular way.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] that I believe the Senate has the papers on the river and harbor bill, and it would have to act on that bill first.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. My idea is that if we could discuss the river and harbor bill to-day it would give more time for the other bill to-morrow, and probably get rid of both.

Mr. KITCHIN. I imagine we can take up the river and harbor bill to-morrow.

Mr. WALSH. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that if a request is made to take up the river and harbor bill to-day I shall object.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Well, that settles it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts object to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. LEVER. No; the gentleman does not object to my request.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand the request of the gentleman from South Carolina, it is that the conference report on the food-control bill shall be filed with the Journal clerk, with the same effect as if it was presented to the House through the regular channel?

Mr. LEVER. Through the regular channel.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a very simple request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina that he may file the conference report on the food-control bill later, when it is ready, and that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so that he may call it up to-morrow?

There was no objection.

FOOD SURVEY BILL.

Mr. BORLAND. I suggest to the gentleman from South Carolina that he make a similar request to file the conference report on the food-survey bill, H. R. 4188, in case an agreement is reached to-day.

Mr. LEVER. I may say in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri that there are only one or two points of difference between the two Houses on the food-production bill. I am satisfied we can reach an agreement probably in 15 minutes after the conferees meet, and it would expedite our getting away from here if I might have that consent.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will ask for unanimous consent, the Chair will put his request.

Mr. LEVER. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, do the conference reports to which the gentleman refers go to the House or Senate first?

Mr. LEVER. The House in both cases. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may file the conference report if it is agreed upon for the food survey and production bill with the proper clerk, and that it be printed in the RECORD under the rule, and that consent be given that I call it up to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that he may file the conference report, if it is agreed upon, with the Clerk, in the food survey and production bill, and that the report and statement may be printed in the RECORD under the rule, and gives notice that he will call it up to-morrow after we get through with the conference report on the food-control bill. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from North Carolina what is his idea as to adjourning after we get through with these three important bills?

Mr. KITCHIN. I think that then we ought to have a gentleman's agreement to adjourn every three days, as we did week before last, until the Senate passes the revenue bill.

Mr. MADDEN. What about the Appropriation Committee's bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. I imagine that the Appropriation Committee will prefer to wait until the latter part of the session before reporting that bill. There might be another deficiency bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Will not their report have something to do with the revenue bill?

Mr. GILLETT. Let me say to the gentleman that that report will not be ready for some time.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think it would be better policy to wait until the latter part of the session and have all the deficiencies come together.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman from North Carolina give any assurance to the House that after disposing of the conference reports on these three respective bills it will be his disposition to ask for a gentleman's agreement to adjourn for three days at a time until the Senate passes the revenue bill?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is my wish.

Mr. RAKER. Reserving the right to object, I want to say to the gentleman from North Carolina before this matter is agreed upon that there are a number of small matters on the Unanimous Consent Calendar that ought to be disposed of.

Mr. ADAMSON. Before the gentleman from North Carolina concludes his compact——

Mr. KITCHIN. I am not making any compact yet.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to say that there are two important commerce bills in conference, and upon which we came pretty near an agreement this morning. They will be agreed upon soon, and I hope we may not be precluded from the consideration of them.

Mr. KITCHIN. I imagine that we can dispose of them before Saturday.

Mr. ADAMSON. I hope that we will conclude them to-morrow; they are very important bills.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think we can dispose of them this week.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from South Carolina state his request so that we will understand it?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I object to the second request of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. KITCHIN. Oh, I hope the gentleman from Washington will not object to that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will withdraw the objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to have the gentleman from South Carolina state exactly what his request is.

The SPEAKER. The request is that the gentleman from South Carolina shall have the privilege, if the conferees agree on the food-survey bill, to file his report and statement and have it published in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. To be acted upon to-morrow?

Mr. LEVER. That was not included in my request, but I give notice that I will call it up after the other food bill is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

OBJECTION TO EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the food bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the food bill. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 4954, a reclamation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bill H. R. 4954. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 3, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Incline Thine ear, O God, our Heavenly Father, and hear our petition. We do not come asking for greater or more abundant blessings than Thou hast already bestowed upon us, but we do fervently pray for wisdom, strength, and courage to use the gifts Thou hast so abundantly bestowed upon us with unselfish devotion to righteousness, truth, and justice, to the honor and glory of Thy Holy Name, in the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ELSTON, indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

To Mr. VENABLE, for 10 days, on account of private business.

To Mr. FORDNEY, at the request of Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

COMMUNICATION OF THE PRESIDENT TO THE PROVISIONAL RUSSIAN GOVERNMENT.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed therein the letter of President Wilson to the Provisional Russian Government setting out America's war aims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the letter of the President to the Russian Government. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, when was that written?

Mr. CRISP. The copy of the communication which I have does not seem to be dated, but it was written just as the commission went there. It has never been printed in the RECORD and there are a good many requests being made for it, Mr. Hempstead, the enrolling clerk, tells me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The communication referred to is as follows:

In view of the approaching visit of the American delegation to Russia to express the deep friendship of the American people for the people of Russia and to discuss the best and most practical means of cooperation between the two peoples in carrying the present struggle for the freedom of all peoples to a successful consummation, it seems opportune and appropriate that I should state again, in the light of this new partnership, the objects the United States has had in mind in entering the war. Those objects have been very much beclouded during the past few weeks by mistaken and misleading statements, and the issues at stake are too momentous, too tremendous, too significant, for the whole human race to permit any misinterpretations or misunderstandings, however slight, to remain uncorrected for a moment.

WAR GOING AGAINST GERMANY.

The war has begun to go against Germany, and in their desperate desire to escape the inevitable ultimate defeat, those who are in authority in Germany are using every possible instrumentality, are making use even of the influence of groups and parties among their own subjects to whom they have never been just or fair, or even tolerant, to promote a propaganda on both sides of the sea which will preserve for them their influence at home and their power abroad, to the undoing of the very men they are using.

The position of America in this war is so clearly avowed that no man can be excused for mistaking it. She seeks no material profit or aggrandizement of any kind. She is fighting for no advantage or selfish object of her own, but for the liberation of peoples everywhere from the aggressions of autocratic force.

BERLIN'S PROJECT OF POWER.

The ruling classes in Germany have begun of late to profess a like liberality and justice of purpose, but only to preserve the power they have set up in Germany and the selfish advantages which they have wrongly gained for themselves and their private projects of power all the way from Berlin to Bagdad and beyond. Government after Government has by their influence, without open conquest of its territory, been linked together in a net of intrigue directed against nothing less than the peace and liberty of the world. The meshes of that intrigue must be broken, but can not be broken unless wrongs already done are undone, and adequate measures must be taken to prevent it from ever again being rewoven or repaired.

GERMANY SEEKING PLEDGES.

Of course, the Imperial German Government and those whom it is using for their own undoing are seeking to obtain pledges that the war will end in the restoration of the status quo ante. It was the status quo ante out of which this iniquitous war issued forth, the power of the Imperial German Government within the Empire and its widespread domination and influence outside of that Empire. That status must be altered in such fashion as to prevent any such hideous thing from ever happening again.

We are fighting for the liberty, the self-government, and the undictated development of all peoples, and every feature of the settlement that concludes this war must be conceived and executed for that purpose. Wrongs must first be righted and then adequate safeguards must be created to prevent their being committed again. We ought not to consider remedies merely because they have a pleasing and sonorous sound. Practical questions can be settled only by practical means. Phrases will not accomplish the result. Effective readjustments will, and whatever readjustments are necessary must be made.

PRINCIPLE OF READJUSTMENTS.

But they must follow a principle, and that principle is plain. No people must be forced under sovereignty under which it does not wish to live. No territory must change hands except for the purpose of securing those who inhabit it a fair chance of life and liberty. No indemnities must be insisted on except those that constitute payment for manifest wrongs done. No readjustments of power must be made except such as will tend to secure the future peace of the world and the future welfare and happiness of its peoples.

And then the free peoples of the world must draw together in some common covenant, some genuine and practical cooperation that will in effect combine their force to secure peace and justice in the dealings of nations with one another.

MUST REALIZE COMMON LIFE.

The brotherhood of mankind must no longer be a fair but empty phrase; it must be given a structure of force and reality. The nations must realize their common life and effect a workable partnership to secure that life against the aggressions of autocratic and self-pleasing power.

For these things we can afford to pour out blood and treasure. For these are the things we have always professed to desire, and unless we pour out blood and treasure now and succeed we may never be able to unite or show conquering force again in the great cause of human liberty. The day has come to conquer or submit. If the forces of autocracy can divide us, they will overcome us; if we stand together victory is certain and the liberty which victory will secure. We can afford then to be generous, but we can not afford then or now to be weak or omit any single guarantee of justice and security.

WOODROW WILSON.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by filing a statement of the essential differences between the House revenue bill and the Senate revenue bill as reported to the Senate July 3, especially with reference to the excess profits tax and the income tax.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner stated. Is there objection?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman if he refers to the bill reported and subsequently withdrawn?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And not to the bill as we read of it in the newspapers?

Mr. KITCHIN. We do not know what kind of a bill they are going to report finally, but I hope after they see the differences I shall set forth between the two bills they will report a different bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I trust so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I suppose this is for the purpose of expediting action in the other body?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes; and to give the real truth about the situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up a conference report upon the river and harbor appropriation bill and asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have the report read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 116).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 2, 3, 8, 13, 16, 22, 24, and 42.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 4, 5, 6, 7, 12, 14, 15, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 23, 25, 26, 27, 33, 34, and 35, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the language proposed insert the following:

Cape Cod Canal, Mass., connecting Buzzards and Cape Cod Bays, with reference to the advisability of the purchase of said canal by the United States and the construction over the route of the said canal of a free waterway, with or without a guard lock, and having a depth and capacity sufficient to accommodate the navigation interests that are affected thereby. "If the said Secretaries are all in favor of the acquisition of the said canal, the Secretary of War is hereby further authorized to enter into negotiations for its purchase, including all property, franchises, and appurtenances used or acquired for use in connection therewith or appertaining thereto; and he is further authorized, if in the judgment of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of Commerce, that the price for such canal is reasonable and satisfactory, to make contracts for the purchase of the same, at the option of the United States, subject to future ratification and appropriation by the Congress; or, in the event of the inability of the Secretary of War to make a satisfactory contract for the voluntary purchase of said Cape Cod Canal and its appurtenances, he is hereby authorized and directed, through the Attorney General, to institute and carry to completion proceedings for the condemnation of said canal and its appurtenances, the acceptance of the award in said proceedings to be subject to the future ratification and appropriation by Congress. Such condemnation proceedings shall be instituted and conducted in, and jurisdiction of said proceedings is hereby given to the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts, substantially as provided in 'An act to authorize condemnation of land for sites for public buildings, and for other purposes,' approved August 1, 1888; and the sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated to pay the necessary costs thereof and expenses in connection therewith. The Secretary of War is further authorized and directed to report the proceedings hereunder to Congress."

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement explaining the effect of the action agreed upon:

The rivers and harbors bill as it passed the House carried cash appropriations in the sum of $27,696,150. The amount added by amendment in the Senate was $194,000 in cash appropriations, making the total of the bill as it passed the Senate $27,890,150. As a result of the conference, the amount involved in the Senate amendments has been reduced from $194,000 to $130,000, making the total of the bill as it now stands $27,826,150.

The following statement shows the action taken by the conference on each of the Senate amendments:

JNO. H. SMALL,
CHAS. F. BOOHER,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. STAFFORD. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. SMALL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. TREADWAY. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, how much time is to be occupied? Can not some agreement be made about time touching a discussion of this report?

Mr. SMALL. It is my purpose to move the previous question, at any rate, at the end of an hour.

Mr. CANNON. After all is said and done, that is a very small time.

Mr. SMALL. This bill has been extensively debated. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFARD].

Mr. CANNON. I just want to see if we can not agree upon some time. I would like to have 20 minutes. The Waterways Commission has never been discussed in this House, and yet it ranges almost supreme power from the birth of the Master to the death of the devil.

Mr. SMALL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman be willing to accede to the request of the gentleman from Illinois for 20 minutes?

Mr. SMALL. In view of other requests, I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Illinois 10 minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I could not much more than call attention to the Waterways Commission provision in that time. We have plenty of time to-day to dispose of all of these conference reports, and I would like to have 20 minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, after the gentleman from Wisconsin concludes I shall be glad to yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the Democratic conferees on the part of the House upon their success in agreeing to nearly all of the Senate amendments, especially all of the Senate amendments that could in any wise be considered a further raid upon the Treasury. There was considerable discussion during the consideration of this bill in the House to that provision which provided no surveys provided for in this bill should be undertaken unless the Secretary of War would recommend that they were associated with the prosecution of the war. The Senate struck out that provision. The House conferees, at least the Democratic Members on the part of the House, as this report has not been approved by the Republican Members, acquiesced in the position of the Senate.

This bill throughout has the vice that in these war times, when every energy of the Government should be concentrated on war activities, of calling the men, like Government engineers, civil engineers, and others employed in these various engineering stations throughout the country, who are fitted for war employment, into avenues of employment that are not necessary for war purposes. But the conferees go further. They have provided for the creation of a commission to study territorial conditions in every particular so far as water is concerned except prohibition. I am surprised they did not include the dry provision that is agitated at both ends of the Capitol and everything connected with this subject in this Waterways Commission.

We all know that this commission proposal has never received any consideration in this House. It provides for the appointment of seven members, at a salary of $7,500, to report on all kinds of omnibus provisions, which upon the face of the amendment shows that it can not be put into effect during war times, but will just detract from the force of men needed for war activities on work that is largely academic and will result in little practical advantage.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. And the commission is authorized to employ an unlimited number of men at any price the commission seeks to pay, and thereby makes another raid on the Treasury.

Mr. STAFFORD. A raid to the extent of $100,000 and in the preparation of large volumes of testimony which will never be used, just like the work of all such commissions has been in the past. That is in line with the whole theory of this bill, a withdrawal from the activities of war to the activities of peace, and this country can not afford to have these men employed in anything but war activities. Take, for instance, the hundreds of men who are employed in these various engineering depots throughout the country. Those men could well be utilized in war employment; but no, you go directly against the demands of the time and have them concentrated upon the survey of some hundred or more little creeks, fishing creeks, or whatnot, which everyone knows will never have any substantial commerce of the country upon them. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] rises——

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BORLAND. I want to say that in these matters the policy is to use retired engineer officers.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman forgets that he only takes into consideration retired officers, and he has no idea of the hundreds of civilian employees now employed by the Government on the pay roll that will be utilized in the survey of these fishing creeks and dry creeks.

Mr. BORLAND. I call the gentleman's attention to Gen. Bixby——

Mr. STAFFORD (continuing). And retired officers are necessary for war activities and should be able to be employed as such, unless it might be the Missouri River creek——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield? I will call his attention to the fact that while this report only appropriates $100,000, it authorizes the commission to do anything, and that might commit the Government to an expenditure of $100,000,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it is the most outlandish and fantastic scheme ever submitted to the Congress, especially in war times; and we may be well justified, in view of all conditions, in rejecting the whole report.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if he will yield me five minutes?

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois yields back the remainder of his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois yields back nine minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have been strenuous in my opposition to the passage of this bill, because I did not believe that it was justified at this time, and I made up my mind, after the bill passed the House and passed the Senate, that I would not interpose any further objection to it. But I had no idea that the conferees were going to report in favor of this commission, which, when created, will be authorized to expend anything up to $1,000,000 in the performance of the work with which this law will charge them.

I was in hopes that the conferees would take the House into their confidence. The proposition submitted in the report for the creation of a commission has never been considered by the House. No man in this House knows a thing about the provisions of this commission item, and the conferees really ought to be sent back with instructions to eliminate this uncertain proposal from the river and harbor bill. Unlimited numbers of men may be employed by this commission. Places can be filled at any rate of wage which they choose to pay. The civil-service law is to be ignored. There is to be a new raid upon the Treasury for the purpose of paying political obligations by the appointment of political hacks to positions under the Government. Appropriation committees of the House are directed by the law to appropriate any money which this commission proposes to have appropriated, and they can not refuse to appropriate, because the law authorizes the commission to create the obligation. I hope every man in the House believes we ought not to pass a law giving any commission unlimited power to expend public money without having some information upon which to base our action. No exception can be taken by the conferees to the demand of the House for the right to consider the most important provision that has ever been reported in a river and harbor bill. I presume the conferees were strictly within their rights in agreeing to the Senate amendment, but it seems to me that the importance of the item and the uncertainty of the obligations created by the adoption of that item should have made the conferees pause and consider, and ask the House for advice, and give the House an opportunity to discuss the questions involved in it; but we come here at the last hour with a report containing an item upon which we are not allowed to vote separately. We must either vote the whole bill up or vote it down. There is no opportunity given for a separate vote upon this item, and I submit to the judgment of the House that we ought not to vote for the confirmation of this report until this commission item is eliminated from it. If there is to be a commission appointed, let the House have an opportunity to consider that important question. There has been no opportunity given to the House for its consideration, and it is not fair to the people of America to saddle this uncertain obligation upon them when they are being taxed beyond their limit of endurance to find the money to pay the cost of the war; and, gentlemen, this ought not to be allowed to go through.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The gentleman is aware that this proposition was in the bill when it came into the House, and that it would have been considered had not the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] made a point of order against it. The gentleman from Massachusetts, who sympathized with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], prevented its consideration.

Mr. STAFFORD. But it was not considered.

Mr. SMALL. How much time does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] desire?

Mr. TREADWAY. Ten minutes.

Mr. SMALL. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts 10 minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to move to recommit the conference report to the conferees, with instructions to report the same back forthwith, striking therefrom the commission section. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion will be put just before the vote on the conference report.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, the remarks made by both gentlemen from Illinois [Mr. CANNON and Mr. MADDEN], in reference to this commission item in the bill, have covered the ground very thoroughly. The last gentleman [Mr. MADDEN] stated that he was surprised that the conference report included this item. He said he had no idea that it would be included. Let me say to him and to the House, as a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, that was the one provision we were told at the beginning of the consideration of this bill by which a river and harbor bill could be approved at this time. We took up the consideration of the various items in the river and harbor bill confronted with the fact that unless the commission was established the bill could not become a law. The members of the committee understood that, and the minority of the committee objected to its inclusion.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. By what authority was that statement made?

Mr. TREADWAY. To the committee?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, possibly I overstepped the rights of committee membership in making that statement; but it was certainly the general understanding among the members of the committee that unless the commission was included no river and harbor bill would receive Executive approval.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me just one remark?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. This proposition has been lurking around Congress for a number of years. It is known as the Newlands proposition.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. It covered almost everything that you can think of. I do not believe that this bill would fail if that amendment were disagreed to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I understood the gentleman to say that this bill would not receive Executive approval without this commission provision.

Mr. TREADWAY. That is my understanding, and has been from the very first of the consideration of this bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Has the President ever advocated this commission?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will not say that he has, so far as my individual knowledge goes; but it is the general understanding of the committee that the President favors the establishment of this commission, and it was on that account that it was included in this bill, and for the very purpose of securing Executive approval of the bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. To the gentleman's knowledge, has the President ever written a letter to any Member of this House advocating the creation of this commission?

Mr. TREADWAY. The chairman of our committee had several conferences with the President in reference to the consideration of the river and harbor bill, and I think I am fair in stating that at the beginning of the conferences it was understood there should be no river and harbor bill at this session, and, further than that, I understand the Democratic caucus so voted. The gentleman can draw his own conclusion as to the reason for the change of sentiment later on.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it not a fact that substantially this same provision was reported in the House bill by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and was stricken out in the House on a point of order?

Mr. TREADWAY. At the last session of Congress?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; at this session of Congress.

Mr. TREADWAY. It certainly was stricken out on a point of order, and it was also stricken out of the previous bill. The House committee reported the bill with this item in it for the very purpose of securing Executive sanction to the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; but the impression has been given here that this is an entirely new matter, so far as the House is concerned.

Mr. TREADWAY. Not at all; this has been floating around here for years. It has been talked of as long as I have been a member of the committee. It is nothing new, but it has not been considered on the floor of the House; and not only that, but every time it has bobbed up here it is made broader; it is broader to-day than ever before. It is carrying higher salaries and more employees than ever before. It can not get much broader than it is now, because it is proposed to study everything under the skies above and the ground beneath. It has nothing whatever to do with river and harbor work in any sense of the word. It excludes the civil service and is designed to take care of good Democratic politicians that have no other employment under the Government. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is what this commission is for and nothing else.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Certainly.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Is it not a fact that it was the gentleman's own motion in making the point of order which prevented the House from considering the item on the floor?

Mr. TREADWAY. I certainly raised the point of order, but what has that got to do with its coming back here in the conference report? It was out of order in the bill and ought to have been out of order in the conference report.

Mr. DUPRÉ. It would have given an opportunity to thrash the question out on the floor of the House.

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes; but what would have been the result? It was a part of the report of the committee, and the committee stood for the bill as a whole. It had pork enough in it, but this commission is a whole hog of pork for the Democratic Party.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Then, if it is bound to go through, what is the use of kicking about the result?

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania the other day said that we were only giving 26 cents for each individual for the streams in the country, but this will give them 26,000 if they conclude to spend that amount, because they can spend money unlimited. It is true that the bill only appropriates $100,000——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the limit, if the gentleman pleases.

Mr. TREADWAY (reading)—

There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as Congress may hereafter determine, and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, available until expended.

In other words, when this high-priced Democratic commission proceeds to expend any sum it has a mind to, it can then come to Congress and tell us that we must pay the bills.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I want to ask the gentleman if he included in his motion to recommit a disagreement to the Senate amendment which relates to the acquisition of the Cape Cod Canal?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will be frank with the gentleman, I never was in favor of the purchase by the Government of the Cape Cod Canal. I never have favored it and do not favor it now, but if you are going to pass such a miserable bill as this bill is, let us include a fairly decent item, such as the Cape Cod proposition. It is better than a thousand of the other items that you pass in the rivers and harbors bill and better than lots of items in this bill.

Mr. DUPRÉ. The gentleman does not approve of it, but he lets it remain in the bill.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I will.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman spoke about the commission expending more than the $100,000 and then coming to Congress for the money. Is it the gentleman's opinion that the commission is authorized to make contracts for indebtedness without an appropriation being made?

Mr. TREADWAY. Theoretically the gentleman is correct. As a matter of fact the expenditures of a commission of the Government would have an unlimited scope, but their requests for such expenses as they desired to incur would be promptly met.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk some in my time about the bill. The whole bill has been based on the proposition of helping each other. The chairman of the committee criticized the opposition to this bill, said it was not fair, that it had not honestly criticized any item in the bill. Why, we criticized hundreds of them, but what was the use? The criticisms were legitimate and fair, but of what avail when those interested in the passage of the bill were banded together in an effort to keep the bill as reported by the committee, in order not to strike out any item if it was beneficial for any Member of Congress? These items do not stand on their own merit, they are in an omnibus bill, and there are a sufficient number of unmeritorious items in the bill to permit the opposition to be absolutely honest and fair when they say and can demonstrate that it is a pork-barrel bill. That is exactly what it is. It is not a war-emergency measure in any sense of the word.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that in discussing this commission some assertions have been made that the text of the paragraph will not support. It is as follows:

SEC. 19. That a commission, to be known as the Waterways Commission, consisting of seven members, to be appointed by the President of the United States, at least one of whom shall be chosen from the active or retired list of the Engineer Corps of the Army, at least one of whom shall be an expert hydraulic engineer from civil life, and the remaining five of whom may each be selected either from civil life or the public service, is hereby created and authorized, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe, and subject to the approval of the heads of the several executive departments concerned, to bring into coordination and cooperation the engineering, scientific, and constructive services, bureaus, boards, and commissions of the several governmental departments of the United States and commissions created by Congress that relate to the study, development, or control of waterways and water resources and subjects related thereto, or to the development and regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, with a view to uniting such services in investigating, with respect to all watersheds in the United States, questions relating to the development, improvement, regulation, and control of navigation as a part of interstate and foreign commerce, including therein the related questions of irrigation, drainage, forestry, arid and swamp-land reclamation, clarification of streams, regulation of flow, control of floods, utilization of water power, prevention of soil erosion and waste, storage and conservation of water for agricultural, industrial, municipal, and domestic uses, cooperation of railways and waterways, and promotion of terminal and transfer facilities, to secure the necessary data, and to formulate and report to Congress, as early as practicable, a comprehensive plan or plans for the development of waterways and the water resources of the United States for the purposes of navigation and for every useful purpose, and recommendations for the modification or discontinuance of any project herein or heretofore adopted. Any member appointed from the retired list shall receive the same pay and allowances as he would if on the active list, and no member selected from the public service shall receive additional compensation for services on said commission, and members selected from civil life shall receive compensation of $7,500 per annum.

In all matters done, or to be done, under this section relating to any of the subjects, investigations, or questions to be considered hereunder, and in formulating plans, and in the preparation of a report or reports, as herein provided, consideration shall be given to all matters which are to be undertaken, either independently by the United States or by cooperation between the United States and the several States, political subdivisions thereof, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals within the jurisdiction, powers, and rights of each, respectively, and with a view to assigning to the United States such portion of such development, promotion, regulation, and control as may be undertaken by the United States, and to the States, political subdivisions thereof, municipalities, communities, corporations, and individuals such portions as belong to their respective jurisdictions, rights, and interests.

The commission is authorized to employ, or retain, and fix the compensation for the services of such engineers, transportation experts, experts in water development and utilization, and constructors of eminence as it may deem necessary to make such investigations and to carry out the purposes of this section. And in order to defray the expenses made necessary by the provisions of this section there is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as Congress may hereafter determine, and the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, available until expended, to be paid out upon warrants drawn on the Secretary of the Treasury by the chairman of said commission.

The commission shall have power to make every expenditure requisite for and incident to its authorized work, and to employ in the District of Columbia and in the field such clerical, legal, engineering, artistic, and expert services as it may deem advisable, including the payment of per diem in lieu of subsistence for employees engaged in field work or traveling on official business, rent of offices in the District of Columbia and in the field, and the purchase of books, maps, and office equipment.

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to delay, prevent, or interfere with the completion of any survey, investigation, project, or work herein or heretofore or hereafter adopted or authorized upon or for the improvement of any of the rivers or harbors of the United States or with legislative action upon reports heretofore or hereafter presented.

This is the language of the section. An outline of its purpose may be stated more briefly. It creates a commission of seven members whose duty it shall be to prepare a plan for dealing more wisely than we have yet been able to deal with legislation for the improvement of our waterways.

In preparing its plan the commission is to bring into coordination and cooperation all the various agencies of the Government that have to do with the study, development, or control of waterways, water resources, or related questions.

The related questions include irrigation, drainage, forestry, arid and swamp land reclamation, clarification of streams, regulation of flow, control of floods, utilization of water power, prevention of soil erosion and waste, storage and conservation of water for agricultural, industrial, and domestic uses, cooperation of railways and waterways, and promotion of terminal and transfer facilities. The field is a vast one, but all these interests are directly affected or may be affected by work upon a single project undertaken for only one purpose. For example, a dam built to impound waters as a measure for flood control may serve also to maintain a water supply for industrial and domestic purposes through the dry season of the year or even to prolong the annual period during which slack-water navigation is possible in a stream which is not navigable throughout the year.

A comprehensive plan for the development of waterways for navigation and other useful purposes is to be prepared by the commission and presented to Congress for consideration. In the meantime none of the provisions of this legislation shall be permitted to delay or interfere with the progress of any investigation of work heretofore or hereafter undertaken for the improvement of any of our rivers or harbors. When the commission has prepared its plan and reported it to Congress the Congress will, of course, have full power to adopt it in whole or in part or to reject it altogether.

It seems to me that if any one thing is needed to redeem the whole method of making appropriations for rivers and harbors, it is that we have such a comprehensive plan as this legislation attempts to provide. The opposition to river and harbor legislation that is made every year by such Members as the gentleman from Wisconsin has been very largely opposition to the present plan. The opposition that exists in the minds of people throughout the country is to the present plan, the log-rolling plan, sometimes spoken of as the pork-barrel plan. If I might speak of myself, I would say that I have voted against more than one rivers and harbors bill because of the so-called pork-barrel item in them. I am convinced that our best chance to get rid of the pork-barrel characteristics of these bills, and also of the public-buildings bills, is to have some definite, comprehensive plan by which we undertake to make appropriations for needed items. This is not a new notion of mine.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman remember that the gentleman from Wisconsin has frequently suggested the importance of having a systematic plan for the development of waterways?

Mr. TEMPLE. That has been my understanding of his position.

I had begun to say that I have not been recently converted to the project of creating a National Waterways Commission. I desire to call attention to a bill (H. R. 6283) which I introduced in the Sixty-third Congress, which provides practically for the same kind of a commission to do the same kind of work and report on the same subject. Section 3 reads as follows:

SEC. 3. That the national rivers commission shall proceed forthwith to gather, classify, and analyze such information as it may deem necessary in order to prepare a comprehensive plan for the utilization and control of the rivers of the United States in such manner as to yield the greatest practicable benefit to all the people. Such plan shall be prepared as speedily as practicable and shall take account of all users of said rivers and benefits to be derived from their control, including among other matters navigation, irrigation, water power, domestic and municipal water supply, flood prevention and control, stream pollution, soil erosion, and terminals and cooperation between rail and river transportation.

The question is not a new one to me; it may have been sprung as a new thing on certain Members of the present Congress. I believe that it is the only way that we can get a comprehensive plan. Concerning the power of the commission to spend money I desire to say a word if I may have the time. This measure will appropriate $100,000 to enable the commission to make its investigations and to prepare and report its plan. Before the commission can expend another cent it must, of course, have another appropriation from Congress. We are not voting anything away from the power of Congress. Before the plan that the commission adopts can be put into operation it must be presented to Congress and be approved here. Before they can spend one cent beyond the $100,000 they must come to us and ask for an appropriation. Not only is the plan free from danger, but it is the most sensible plan for taking care of the rivers and harbors proposition and getting rid of the pork-barrel element that has yet been proposed in Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentlemen from New York [Mr. HULBERT].

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, as one member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, who has been as punctual in his attendance at meetings of the committee as any other member, I wish to deny, so far as I am concerned, that any understanding was had or any suggestion made that this bill would not receive Executive approval unless there were contained in it some such provision for the appointment of a commission as is now under consideration. And I propose to vote for the commission only because I believe that the President will appoint men of such high character and ability that the report submitted by them will do more than anything else to eliminate the conditions which have given rise to the cry of "pork barrel" when legislation of this character has been submitted to the House for its consideration. My greatest surprise is to find the men who have been loudest in their denunciation of "pork barrel," the most vigorous in their protest against the plan for its eradication.

This commission is merely one of investigation. Its duties are to collate information and submit it to this Congress, and everyone who has sat here and listened to the discussion of the rivers and harbors bill certainly appreciates that many who have attacked this measure are sadly in need of information which this commission will report to Congress. If, on the other hand, the majority of the membership is not favorable to the enactment of the plan recommended, Congress need have no compunction to reject it.

There is just one other matter to which I desire to direct attention in this connection. I had hoped it would be remedied by the conferees. Section 19 provides that this commission shall investigate matters, among others—that relate to the study, development, or control of waterways and water resources and subjects related thereto, or to the development and regulation of interstate and foreign commerce.

There is not, in my judgment, a sufficient direction incorporated in that language to indicate that it will be within the purview of this commission to study the improvement of streams with respect to their navigation for military, naval, and strategic requirements, and appreciating the difficulty with which we met in securing the enactment in this bill of the amendment providing for the deepening of the East River at Hell Gate to 40 feet, in my judgment, the bill should provide that one of the seven commissioners to be appointed should be a civil engineer of the Navy, as was provided in the Panama Canal act, and under the authority of which President Roosevelt appointed Admiral Rosseau upon the commission that constructed that great waterway. While the bill does not specifically provide that, it does not contain any prohibition against the appointment of any such official, and I hope that the Members of this House who have at heart the making of suitable provision for the development of our harbors and their tributary waterways for naval purposes will interest themselves to the extent of bringing this condition to the attention of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy and the President, as the Commander in Chief of both branches of the service, urging that the Navy as well as the Army be recognized in filling appointments upon this commission. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask how much time has been consumed?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 19 minutes left.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR]. I wish I could make it more.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have 10 minutes, because this is a large subject to discuss. I am a member of the committee and have made something of a study of the matter, and I went to the chairman of the committee a few minutes ago and asked for 10 minutes, and whereas extended time has been given to other gentlemen not connected with the committee, it seems to me I am entitled to express my views. I wish to say briefly to you gentlemen that no worse "pork-barrel" plan has been conceived in the history of this country than that which is comprehended in the proposition contained in this commission plan found in the bill. The Newlands bill in its original proposition asked for $600,000,000, and this is only intended to carry out the provisions of that bill, to be divided, as I now remember, in 10 districts throughout the country of $60,000,000 each. No such bill was ever proposed before in Congress, and when any gentleman says that this is to carry out a river and harbor proposition let me say he has not the faintest conception of what has been proposed in the Newlands bill, with which this is simply in line. Let me suggest——

Mr. DUPRÉ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I have been given only five minutes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. I want to ask if Senator NEWLANDS made a speech for the commission yesterday?

Mr. FREAR. He made a speech for his commission. What is this commission? I introduced a bill, referred to, which provides for a commission of experts in waterways familiar with conditions in Europe as well as conditions in this country, who would take over the harbors, who would take over the real waterways of this country, and proceed to the developing of them whenever commercial needs demand, giving authorizations at the start for the full expenditure not in the dribbling way we have to-day but pursuing a businesslike, intelligent handling of waterways in the same manner that we handle the railway problem. What have we here in this commission? I will read it:

To the study, development, or control of waterways and water resources and subjects related thereto, or to the development and regulation of interstate and foreign commerce.

Now, gentlemen on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, you can go out of business.

With a view to uniting such services in investigating, with respect to all watersheds in the United States, questions relating to the development, improvement, regulation, and control of navigation as a part of interstate and foreign commerce, including therein the related questions of irrigation, drainage, forestry, arid and swamp land reclamation, clarification of streams, regulation of flow—

Gentlemen on the Public Lands Committee, you are to be superseded by this commission—regulation of flow, control of flood—

Where is that Flood Control Committee we have just appointed? It is to be superseded by this commission—utilization of water power, prevention of soil erosion and waste—

Here we have a half dozen committees that are given jurisdiction over such matters—prevention of soil erosion and waste; storage and conservation of water for agricultural, industrial, municipal, and domestic uses; cooperation of railways and waterways; and promotion of terminal and transfer facilities.

Now, I will not read beyond that. Mr. Speaker, I merely want to state that this commission is practically called upon to take the jurisdiction of a dozen committees of this House which to-day are performing their functions in the House. It is impossible in its conception or administration. This is the Newlands commission primarily, and is favored by those generally who have supported river and harbor bills. This, as I said, is the first step to secure the passage of the enormous scheme he introduced providing for $600,000,000, of which $60,000,000 each was to be distributed to 10 different districts, as I now remember the figures. Such a wasteful proposition has never been seriously urged in either House until injected in this river and harbor bill. Now, we have never had any discussion of this measure, and yet Congress is asked to put that proposition in a river and harbor bill.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I will.

Mr. HARDY. Was not the Newlands proposition to expend $600,000,000 spread over 10 or 12 years?

Mr. FREAR. I think it was. It was one proposition in the direction of controlling waterways at the head of flood waters; also for irrigation, reclamation, and closely related matters.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I would ask that I may have a couple of minutes more.

Mr. SMALL. I am sorry I can not grant the gentleman that time. If the gentleman had spoken earlier——

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes more, with the consent of the chairman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the time be extended two minutes and he to use that time. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FREAR. Now let me say, Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question of the gentleman from Texas, that Senator NEWLANDS's proposition was only for a limited commission, for limited work in line with the development of his proposition that proposed to control the floods, reclamation, and so forth, and the $600,000,000 was for such items alone. But think of it—$600,000,000 for such items—and it was well said that it would cost over a billion dollars by men of this House, some of whom were on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

I do not care to discuss the river and harbor bill further. I opposed it as strenuously as I could at different times. I think the bill ought not to pass, for the reason so well stated by my friend and colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], and in contradiction of the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT] I say the committee was informed the President demanded the commission section in the bill, and I challenge the gentlemen who know most about it to deny it. It was stated that the President of the United States demanded this commission, that he insisted upon this commission, that it was one of the primary things in which he was interested. No one will dispute that fact.

That is the situation with which this bill is confronted. I think the whole bill ought to be defeated. I do not believe the legitimate waterways will be injured in any way or in any particular because of the enormous balance of appropriations already on hand. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has again expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for one minute.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, answering the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], I call attention to a bill I have in my hand, introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin, to create a National Waterway Commission, bearing date April 3, 1917, the present year, in which the gentleman from Wisconsin, in the course of 11 pages of legislative matter, proposes that a commission shall be created, with salaries of $10,000 per annum each, to take charge of the investigation of all waterway projects, the kind and draft of vessels to be used thereon, land reclamation, freight rates, transportation, and various other things, the total appropriation to be $500,000. [Applause.]

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. No; I can not yield in one minute. There seems to be a conflict here between the Newlands bill and the Frear bill. The Newlands bill amendment calls for an appropriation of only $100,000 and the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin calls for $500,000. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR], in stating as he did that this proposed commission combines a great many functions now handled by some 12 committees, stated, instead of an objection to the commission, the very strongest argument possible in favor of it.

Here are waterways, and out of those waterways grow a dozen different subjects. First there is the direct subject of navigation. Next comes the question of water power. Next that of redeeming lands which are bad, either by reason of their being arid or of their being swamp lands. Then comes the question of erosion. Those are a few only of the many subjects, correlated, which really are one subject and can be best considered as a whole.

Yet the gentleman from Wisconsin says that the objection to this bill is that we will consider as a comprehensive whole, as one matter, that which really is, in fact and in truth, but one matter, and which can not be considered here in its entirety because of the division by committees.

That is my first answer to this question of a commission. Now, let us take the second question. From the time that any of us have considered this question of waterways we all of us have heard it stated here upon the floor again and again that waterways were not made use of in the proportion to the amount expended for them. Why? Because railroads have their traffic managers and go forth and solicit and secure the traffic of the world. They obtain and have terminal and transfer facilities. Who does that for the waterways? No one. It remains undone and the waterways are unused because we do not provide terminal and transfer facilities and because we have no traffic managers.

What does this commission do? It provides for all those things—the crying need of the day. Why, the railroads solicit and carry the heavy, bulky, nonperishable products, every pound of which should go by water and go slowly. They should not carry a pound of it, and this provision will provide that they shall not carry any of it.

Now, what is the next——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Government is going to improve these rivers so that it can go out and solicit traffic to use them? Is that the purpose of the bill?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I say the purpose of the bill is to coordinate the railway and water transportation so that that which should properly go by water, the slow-moving, nonperishable freight, should go that way, and that the lighter and more perishable products should go by rail.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman mentions "soliciting traffic." How is the Government going to solicit the traffic?

Mr. DEMPSEY. The waterways should have a traffic manager and solicitor, and that would be a long step toward the solution of the transportation problem, in order that we may use all our transportation facilities, in order that we may divert to the water that portion of our freight which the water should carry. To that end, I say, we should have a transportation and traffic manager.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield?

Mr. DEMPSEY. In a moment. Gentlemen attack this bill because they say it provides for projects which do not merit appropriations, but those who raise this objection apparently have not read the language of this clause at all. I call attention to the closing part of the first paragraph:

> That a commission * * * is hereby created and authorized * * * to formulate and report to Congress * * * recommendations for the modification or discontinuance of any project herein or heretofore adopted.

So if there are in the bill projects that are not meritorious, if there are projects that should not have been embarked upon, if there are projects that have been included by mistake, if there is a project for the improvement of a river upon which no money should be expended, the commission will say that that project is one that should be abandoned.

Now, what is the remaining argument against this provision? The remaining argument is that, although we appropriate only $100,000, we may appropriate more. Are we afraid of ourselves? Are we afraid that we are going to do something improper because we do to-day something which is advisable and proper? Are we so distrustful of ourselves that that is the position that we take? Is that the ground upon which we should refuse to act? I hardly think so. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there remaining?

The SPEAKER. Eight minutes.

Mr. SMALL. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GALLAGHER].

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the passage of this bill. I believe that it is simply a waste of public money to spend it as provided here in this bill. Any bill that has for its object the useless expenditure of the people's money is nothing short of public plunder and is a bad bill. [Applause.] I have been on this committee as long as any other member of it. I have seen vast sums spent for river improvement. I have seen millions annually voted for the improvement of rivers and harbors, but as a member of that committee I can testify to you that I do not believe commerce has been helped in a single instance by these large expenditures of money. Tell me where are the boats upon these rivers and where is the increased traffic? Nobody can point it out. Still we go ahead annually, as is provided here, and expend $27,000,000, exactly as we have spent similar and greater sums before, without any benefit or results to the people—no commerce, no boats, no river traffic.

This commission that is provided for in the bill will not help matters or improve conditions in any particular. It is not intended for such a purpose. Why, we all thought that when the board of review of Army engineers was established men who are provided with life positions, and competent men, nothing would be recommended to this House other than necessary and actually needed improvements in river and harbor work. With this bill this board will go out of existence and some very nice jobs provided instead. With all the money we have spent I can not find out where we have benefited commerce in any particular. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, I will consume the remainder of the hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has six minutes.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, we are considering the conference report, and the question is upon its adoption.

Before adverting to the particular item creating a waterways commission, which has been the theme of criticism upon the part of those who are opposed to this bill, I would like to call attention to the fact that every one of the gentlemen who are opposed to this conference report voted against the river and harbor bill; and among those who have spoken in opposition, and who voted against the river and harbor bill, and who have been critical in their discussion of the bill, three of them are members of the River and Harbor Committee—Messrs. TREADWAY of Massachusetts, FREAR of Wisconsin, and GALLAGHER of Illinois. They are divided as to political parties, and therefore any statement which I may make can not be regarded as partisan. I ask, Does the statement that they are members of this great committee, coupled with their attitude in reference to this bill, carry any reasonable and necessary inference regarding the propriety of their violent antagonism to the bill?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Not at this time. In a moment I will. I put that interrogation to the membership of the House. Perhaps with propriety I could not go further. Now I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the gentleman from the committee why it is that in the Cape Cod Canal item it requires three Cabinet officers to enter into negotiations for the purchase of that ditch, while in negotiating for the purchase of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal the matter is confided to the Secretary of War alone?

Mr. SMALL. In answer to the gentleman, I would say that in accordance with the general precedents it should have been confided to the Secretary of War alone. There have been precedents, however, for delegating such powers jointly to several heads of departments, so that it is not entirely without precedent. And if I might answer the gentleman further I would make the suggestion that for more detailed information he inquire of his two Senators.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman mean to say that the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors simply relied upon the two Senators from the State of Massachusetts before putting this into the bill?

Mr. SMALL. No; I simply meant to say that there was no harm in it, and the gentleman must know that conference reports are sometimes the result of compromises.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman please state what investigation the House committee have made with reference to this item?

Mr. SMALL. I will say to the gentleman that for myself I have read probably a thousand pages or more, going back a hundred years. The matter of having a waterway across the isthmus of Cape Cod was discussed in Massachusetts more than a hundred years ago, and it has been discussed at intervals since that time.

Mr. WALSH. So that the knowledge which this committee had before it was in reference to a compromise provision, which has not been discussed in the House.

Mr. SMALL. There is no question about its being a very important provision. May I ask the gentleman in reply, Is he opposed to this item in the conference report?

Mr. WALSH. I have voted against the bill, and expect to vote to recommit it, and also expect to vote against the conference report.

Mr. SMALL. And this particular item?

Mr. WALSH. And am opposed to this item, because it will involve an expenditure of over $50,000,000 before this Government gets any benefit from it. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Very briefly, because my time has about expired.

Mr. COX. I want to ask the gentleman in regard to this commission, and whether he has given any thought or consideration to putting that matter under charge of the Shipping Board, especially in view of the fact that Congress passed a law two years ago giving the Shipping Board power to fix water rates? Has the gentleman any well-defined idea as to whether the work proposed to be given to this commission could be given to the Shipping Board, and save the creation of so everlastingly many independent commissions?

Mr. SMALL. I will answer the gentleman, Mr. Speaker. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. About one-quarter of a minute.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, in view of these interruptions I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the time be extended three minutes, and that he have the time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Indiana I will say that our committee have had the thought that we must at some time repose in some bureau or branch of the Government the power to supervise water transportation and the promotion of commerce on navigable rivers.

Mr. COX. Does not the gentleman believe that the Shipping Board would be the proper repository for that?

Mr. SMALL. It may be that the Shipping Board would be the proper body.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman will study that and see that that provision is made at the next session.

Mr. SMALL. The gentleman from Indiana has given us a valuable thought along that line. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] said that this provision for the Waterway Commission had as its purpose a partisan advantage to the Democratic Party. Mr. Speaker, in reply to that I will say that the appointment of this commission rests with the President of the United States. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Gentlemen may laugh, but gentlemen can not point to a single act of President Wilson in discharging a public duty where he has not put the country above the party. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And the President will do it in this instance. The gentleman also referred to politics in this bill. I take the liberty of saying to the gentleman—and I think I will be sustained by every member of the committee, including the gentleman from Massachusetts himself—that he has never seen during his membership on the committee any politics or partisanship entering into the consideration of any item before the committee.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMALL. Yes; for half a minute.

Mr. TREADWAY. I am delighted to agree with the gentleman's statement so far as the action of the Rivers and Harbors Committee is concerned, but I can not agree with him in his eulogistic statement as to the nonpartisanship of the President in his appointments. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SMALL. Fortunately for the President of the United States, his reputation now and in the future will not be dependent upon the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, about this commission, and with that I shall conclude. Gentlemen who have opposed this commission here to-day have been standing here for years advocating the appointment of a commission with substantially similar powers to this. The provision for this commission, let me say, has the distinct and unqualified approval of a great many students of transportation, particularly of waterway transportation in this country. They are men who believe, as has been frequently stated in this House and was so clearly expressed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE], that there should be some more comprehensive plan; that there should be a larger and more complete coordination of the uses of water, and they believe that this provision here in the language employed will accomplish that large purpose. I am free to say that this provision has the approval of the President of the United States, and yet there has been no intimation or expression at any time that he would veto the bill if it was not in the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] to recommit the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TREADWAY moves that the conference report be recommitted to the conference committee with instructions to the House conferees to disagree to amendment 41, known as the commission section.

The question was being taken, when Mr. TREADWAY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 207, answered "present" 4, not voting 78, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:
That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 7, 10, 12, 14, 15, 20, 21, 22, 30, 44, 45, 46, 51, 52, 53, 60, 62, 64, 65, 66, 70, and 73.
That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 9, 11, 16, 18, 19, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 31, 32, 35, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 48, 49, 50, 56, 57, and 59, and agree to the same.
Amendment numbered 1: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the Senate amendment insert the following:
"That by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement, of foods, feeds, fuel including fuel oil and natural gas, and fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients, tools, utensils, implements, machinery, and equipment required for the actual production of foods, feeds, and fuel, hereafter in this act called necessaries; to prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, manipulations, and private controls, affecting such supply, distribution, and movement; and to establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war. For such purposes the instrumentalities, means, methods, powers, authorities, duties, obligations, and prohibitions hereinafter set forth are created, established, conferred, and prescribed. The President is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as are essential effectively to carry out the provisions of this act."

That, from time to time, whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries, in order to carry into effect any of the purposes of this act, and shall publicly so announce, no person shall, after a date fixed in the announcement, engage in or carry on any such business specified in the announcement of importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries as set forth in such announcement, unless he shall secure and hold a license issued pursuant to this section. The President is authorized to issue such licenses and to prescribe regulations for the issuance of licenses and requirements for systems of accounts and auditing of accounts to be kept by licensees, submission of reports by them, with or without oath or affirmation, and the entry and inspection by the President's duly authorized agents of the places of business of licensees. Whenever the President shall find that any storage charge, commission, profit, or practice of any licensee is unjust, or unreasonable, or discriminatory and unfair, or wasteful, and shall order such licensee, within a reasonable time fixed in the order, to discontinue the same, unless such order, which shall recite the facts found, is revoked or suspended, such licensee shall, within the time prescribed in the order, discontinue such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice. The President may, in lieu of any such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, find what is a just, reasonable, nondiscriminatory and fair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, and in any proceeding brought in any court such order of the President shall be prima facie evidence. Any person who willfully violates the provisions of this section, or who shall use any foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors, or who shall import any such liquors, without first obtaining a license so to do when a license is required under this section, or who shall violate any rule or regulation made under this section, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both: Provided further, That nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the licensing of the manufacture of vinous or malt liquors in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia or any civil subdivision thereof, where the manufacture of such vinous or malt liquor is prohibited."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 68: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 68, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the section number proposed insert "24"; and the Senate agree to the same.

"That if, in the opinion of the President, any such producer or dealer fails or neglects to conform to such prices or regulations, or to conduct his business efficiently under the regulations and control of the President as aforesaid, or conducts it in a manner prejudicial to the public interest, then the President is hereby authorized and empowered in every such case to requisition and take over the plant, business, and all appurtenances thereof belonging to such producer or dealer as a going concern, and to operate or cause the same to be operated in such manner and through such agency as he may direct during the period of the war or for such part of said time as in his judgment may be necessary.

"That any producer or dealer whose plant, business, and appurtenances shall have been requisitioned or taken over by the President shall be paid a just compensation for the use thereof during the period that the same may be requisitioned or taken over as aforesaid, which compensation the President shall fix or cause to be fixed by the Federal Trade Commission.

"That if the prices so fixed, or if, in the case of the taking over or requisitioning of the mines or business of any such producer or dealer the compensation therefor as determined by the provisions of this act be not satisfactory to the person or persons entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just compensation in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

"While operating or causing to be operated any such plants or business, the President is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he may deem essential for the employment, control, and compensation of the employees necessary to conduct the same.

"Or if the President of the United States shall be of the opinion that he can thereby better provide for the common defense, and whenever, in his judgment, it shall be necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, then he is hereby authorized and empowered to require any or all producers of coal and coke, either in any special area or in any special coal fields, or in the entire United States, to sell their products only to the United States through an agency to be designated by the President, such agency to regulate the resale of such coal and coke, and the prices thereof, and to establish rules for the regulation of and to regulate the methods of production, shipment, distribution, apportionment, or storage thereof among dealers and consumers, domestic or foreign, and to make payment of the purchase price thereof to the producers thereof, or to the person or persons legally entitled to said payment.

"That within 15 days after notice from the agency so designated to any producer of coal and coke that his, or its, output is to be so purchased by the United States as hereinbefore described, such producer shall cease shipments of said product upon his own account and shall transmit to such agency all orders received and unfilled or partially unfilled, showing the exact extent to which shipments have been made thereon, and thereafter all shipments shall be made only on authority of the agency designated by the President, and thereafter no such producer shall sell any of said products except to the United States through such agency, and the said agency alone is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase during the continuance of the requirement the output of such producers.

"That the prices to be paid for such products so purchased shall be based upon a fair and just profit over and above the cost of production, including proper maintenance and depletion charges, the reasonableness of such profits and cost of production to be determined by the Federal Trade Commission, and if the prices fixed by the said commission of any such product purchased by the United States as hereinbefore described be unsatisfactory to the person or persons entitled to the same, such person or persons shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

"All such products so sold to the United States shall be sold by the United States at such uniform prices, quality considered, as may be practicable and as may be determined by said agency to be just and fair.

"Any moneys received by the United States for the sale of any such coal and coke may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any moneys not so used shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"That when directed by the President, the Federal Trade Commission is hereby required to proceed to make full inquiry, giving such notice as it may deem practicable, into the cost of producing under reasonably efficient management at the various places of production the following commodities, to wit, coal and coke.

"The books, correspondence, records, and papers in any way referring to transactions of any kind relating to the mining, production, sale, or distribution of all mine operators or other persons whose coal and coke have or may become subject to this section, and the books, correspondence, records, and papers of any person applying for the purchase of coal and coke from the United States shall at all times be subject to inspection by the said agency, and such person or persons shall promptly furnish said agency any data or information relating to the business of such person or persons which said agency may call for, and said agency is hereby authorized to procure the information in reference to the business of such coal-mine operators and producers of coke and customers therefor in the manner provided for in sections 6 and 9 of the act of Congress approved September 26, 1914, entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," and said agency is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise all the powers granted to the Federal Trade Commission by said act for the carrying out of the purposes of this section.

"Having completed its inquiry respecting any commodity in any locality, it shall, if the President has decided to fix the prices at which any such commodity shall be sold by producers and dealers generally, fix and publish maximum prices for both producers of and dealers in any such commodity, which maximum prices shall be observed by all producers and dealers until further action thereon is taken by the commission.

"In fixing maximum prices for producers the commission shall allow the cost of production, including the expense of operation, maintenance, depreciation, and depletion, and shall add thereto a just and reasonable profit.

"In fixing such prices for dealers, the commission shall allow the cost to the dealer and shall add thereto a just and reasonable sum for his profit in the transaction.

"The maximum prices so fixed and published shall not be construed as invalidating any contract in which prices are fixed, made in good faith, prior to the establishment and publication of maximum prices by the commission.

"Whoever shall, with knowledge that the prices of any such commodity have been fixed as herein provided, ask, demand, or receive a higher price, or whoever shall, with knowledge that the regulations have been prescribed as herein provided, violate or refuse to conform to any of the same, shall, upon conviction, be punished by fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both. Each independent transaction shall constitute a separate offense.

"Nothing in this section shall be construed as restricting or modifying in any manner the right the Government of the United States may have in its own behalf or in behalf of any other Government at war with Germany to purchase, requisition, or take over any such commodities for the equipment, maintenance, or support of armed forces at any price or upon any terms that may be agreed upon or otherwise lawfully determined."

A third proviso is added, that the section shall not be construed to prohibit acquiring, storing, or holding for future sale for such advanced price as might prevail in the ordinary course of business and in a free and unrestricted market. It is also provided that the section shall not be construed to repeal the Sherman Antitrust Act. The House recedes and agrees with an amendment changing the punishment for violation of the section to fine or imprisonment, or both, instead of imprisonment only; eliminating the third proviso and substituting a proviso exempting holding or accumulating of any article suitable for human food, fuel, or other necessaries of life by any person in a quantity not in excess of the reasonable requirements of his business for a reasonable time, or reasonably required to furnish such articles produced in surplus quantities seasonally throughout the period of scant or no production; and changing the section number to 26.

On amendment No. 72: This amendment inserts a new section 25, which authorizes the President to procure or aid in procuring nitrate of soda for increasing agricultural production during the calendar years 1917 and 1918 and to dispose of the same at cost, payable in advance. A specific appropriation of $10,000,000 is provided. The House recedes and agrees with an amendment eliminating the specific direction to the President to procure nitrate of soda, authorizing the disposition of the same for cash at cost, including all expenses connected therewith, and changing the section number to 27.

On amendment No. 73: This amendment inserts a new section 26, which provides that nothing in the act shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect either section 6 or section 20 of the act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, approved October 15, 1914. The Senate recedes.

A. F. LEVER,
GORDON LEE,
E. S. CANDLER,
J. THOS. HEFLIN,
G. N. HAUGEN,
JAMES C. MCLAUGHLIN,
SYDNEY ANDERSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that I shall move the previous question at the end of an hour, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, does not the gentleman think he should allow more time than that? The House has not had a moment to discuss this bill since it came over from the Senate with all the Senate amendments, and I would like 15 minutes myself. I would not wish it, of course, if we only had half an hour, and I know a great many men would like a reasonable time to discuss it.

Mr. CANNON. I would like five minutes.

Mr. NORTON. To-day is quite young yet, and it seems to me we could spend a couple of hours or three hours discussing this report.

Mr. LEVER. We have another conference report which we would like to pass to-day.

Mr. NORTON. I understand that, but that probably will not take more than an hour.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield? When this bill is finished the House will adjourn to mark time, and it seems to me the chairman might very well spend a little more time than he suggests for the discussion of this report.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Michigan that a number of gentlemen on both sides of the aisle have come to me this afternoon, urging that we expedite the consideration of this bill. Many of them have their tickets bought for home, and some wish to leave early——

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman think that is a good argument against devoting more time to the consideration of this conference report?

Mr. LEVER. I know it is not a good argument, but this bill has been discussed a whole week in the House and five weeks in the Senate.

Mr. GILLETT. The Senate bill has never been discussed for more than three minutes in the House since it came over from the Senate with all the Senate amendments.

Mr. LEVER. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the House conferees do not think that this bill has been very materially changed in principle by the Senate.

Mr. GILLETT. We would like an opportunity to discuss that.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Iowa, I am satisfied, will be satisfied with 30 minutes of time.

Mr. HAUGEN. There have been a number of requests here, and if time is to be granted to comply with those requests I think it will take more than an hour on this side, possibly two hours, but I agree with the chairman that a great many are very anxious to get away and we would like to accommodate them. Of course, that is for the House to determine, and if the chairman yields 30 minutes to this side I should try to parcel it out to Members so as to accommodate them the best I can, but many of them can not be accommodated, but I think they will be fairly satisfied with the arrangement suggested by the chairman.

Mr. LEVER. Then I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, and at the end of the hour I shall move the previous question.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman will have plenty of time for the other bill, which is not so important as this. I think the gentleman had better grant one hour to a side.

Mr. LEVER. I appreciate what the gentleman from Illinois says and I would like to reiterate that many gentlemen on both sides of the House are very anxious to leave, and some desire to leave early.

Mr. CANNON. It is impossible for them to leave to-day, if the other conference report is to be considered. What would the gentleman say to an hour and a half; that is, three-quarters of an hour to a side?

Mr. LEVER. Would the gentleman be willing that the previous question shall be considered as ordered?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I have no objection to that at all.

Mr. HAUGEN. I was about to make the suggestion that we have three-quarters of an hour on each side, and that the previous question then be considered as ordered.

Mr. LEVER. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for debate on this conference report shall be an hour and thirty minutes, one half to be used by the gentleman from Iowa and the other half by myself, and at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. CANNON. I think that is right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on this conference report be limited to an hour and a half, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], and at the end of the hour and a half the previous question be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Iowa to use some of his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this conference report. It probably does not exactly express the views of any Member of the House, and it certainly does not mine, but in a bill which covers so much ground and so many inflammable topics I agree that it is wise that a compromise report should be adopted, especially when it is very important that some action should speedily be taken.

I am skeptical as to its effects. I do not believe it will accomplish what its authors predict. It establishes a despotic power in one man which is quite contrary to the spirit of our Government, and which we are all reluctant to agree to; and yet in the terrible emergency which is facing us, and in view of the experience of the European countries, whose fate may be ours, this seems to be the wisest remedy.

I hope it will prove adequate and helpful, although I am not sanguine. At any rate, if it fails, it will be no argument against republican government, while if it succeeds it will be a strong illustration of the advantages of despotism. It is an emergency measure, justified only by the extreme pressure of war, and as such I reluctantly vote for it.

There has been an unusual and unreasonable disposition on that side of the House to suppress debate since this bill came over from the Senate. A week ago last Tuesday, when they brought in their rule and were ready to adopt it and then they found there had been an agreement so that they could not have any vote that day, I suggested they give the afternoon to a discussion of the bill, but they declined and adjourned at 1 o'clock, when we might just as well have had the whole afternoon for discussion. The next day when they brought up the bill they immediately moved the previous question before a man on this side could speak a word. I do not think it is particularly surprising they do not want all the amendments of the Senate discussed. I was particularly interested in the amendment providing for a committee on expenditures, and as they had determined to reject that I should not think they would want it discussed, because I can not see any reason for refusing that committee except the usual reason that the Executive always wants his power just as absolute and irresponsible as possible; but I was surprised that the gentleman from South Carolina, the chairman of the committee of conference, the representative of the House, an able, industrious, and popular legislator, instead of wanting to find out what the opinion of the House was upon this bill, rushed up to the White House, and the only information he seemed to care about was the opinion of the President of the United States. And he not only asked the President to write him a letter but he asked of him permission to publish that letter, with the obvious purpose that he might bring presidential pressure to bear for the rejection of that amendment. Perhaps an even more practical pressure than the opinion of the President was exerted, because I saw the great dispenser of administration patronage—the Postmaster General—haunting that day the lobby of the House, as he has on various other days when there was pending a vote which they thought important. I think the gentleman from South Carolina ought to have represented the Congress and not represented the President. [Applause.]

If there ever was a question when the chairman of a conference committee ought to have wanted the opinion of the House, it was here, because this amendment stood up for the rights and powers and privileges of Congress as against the rights and powers and privileges of the Executive. There is always that opposition between Congress and the Executive. Each one always wants to maintain if not increase its own power. Congress is given power over the purse, and the only object that I can see of this amendment, which provided simply that there should be a committee of expenditures which should have power to keep itself posted and advise Congress about expenditures—the only purpose of that was to keep in Congress the power over the purse to which it is entitled; and the gentleman representing Congress in such an issue as that ought not to have rushed up to the White House and catered to the Executive instead of representing the power and the will of their own body. [Applause.]

That side of the House years ago used to criticize us on this side when we controlled the White House and Congress, because bills were sometimes brought in here that were drafted by heads of departments. They used to say it was not the duty of heads of departments to draft bills. They said it was the duty of Congress. But now, when they have the power, as to every bill of any importance that comes in they brag and boast and use as an argument for its passage the fact that it was drafted in some department of the administration. The gentleman from South Carolina, when a question between the House and the Executive comes up, simply asks the opinion of the Executive, and he refuses to allow any debate or any expression of opinion on the part of the House. They would not allow any separate vote; they would not allow any separate word of debate on that amendment until after the whole bill was sent to conference. It seems to me that it is a far greater catering and yielding to Executive influence than anything which they so freely criticized us for doing. Now, it is peculiarly necessary in this session of Congress that we should have such a committee on expenditures as has been proposed, if the House is going to live up to its convictions and seek to retain some control over expenditures, because, with the billions of dollars that we are appropriating, it is impossible for the appropriating committees to make themselves familiar with and to probe deeply into these expenditures. To-day there is a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations that has been sitting for weeks, considering estimates which amount to between $5,000,000,000 and $6,000,000,000 of deficiencies, and we will be sitting weeks more, I have no doubt, before we are ready to report it.

But when we shall have done that I do not flatter myself that we shall have been really able to go to the bottom of those estimates. You can not do it when they are so enormous and when haste is so necessary; you can not do it particularly when the departments themselves are so vague and uncertain. I do not blame them for it. Under this sudden expansion of business they can not give us the full details, because they have not been able to fully post themselves. The only way that Congress can know what is being done with the money appropriated is by having some committee on expenditures like this.

It is not a partisan committee. The committee would consist mainly of men of the President's own party, and my own fear respecting the committee would be that, being of the President's own party, they might imitate the gentleman from South Carolina and find out what the President wanted and act as he preferred. But there is nothing partisan about it, and it is the only possible way in the present juncture by which we can keep in close control of appropriations.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman will remember that the amendment was offered by a Democrat in the Senate.

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Now, what argument is offered against it? The only argument is the letter of the President which the gentleman from South Carolina reported to us, and which he begged the President to send to him in order that he might publish it. And what does that letter allege? It alleges, in the first place, that the adoption of the amendment would show a lack of confidence in the President, and it alleges, in the second place, that it would tend to cripple his work. The only way it would show lack of confidence in the President is the same way that the authors of the American Constitution showed a lack of confidence in the President when they provided that no money should be paid out of the Treasury except as authorized by Congress. It is showing it in the same way as is shown by the checks and balances in our Constitution, which are a part of our republican form of government, which were put in for the purpose of giving Congress the power over appropriations and preventing either the executive or the legislative branch being all powerful. If those showed lack of confidence, then this does; otherwise it does not.

Now, I have great respect for the President, but I do not think that he is omniscient or impeccable, or that we are showing any unfair lack of confidence in him if we provide a committee on expenditures to know how our money is expended. If that is lack of confidence we might as well say "Give the President all power; give up all theories of a republican form of government, and let the President have unlimited autocratic control over expenditures and over legislation." Judging from the action of the chairman of this committee, that is about the kind of authority over expenditures that he thinks we ought to exercise.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Would there be any opportunity to get this expenditures committee matter before the House for a vote?

Mr. GILLETT. No. They were careful that we should not have an opportunity to vote upon it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It was stricken out in conference, so that we have no opportunity to vote upon it here?

Mr. GILLETT. Absolutely none.

The other argument in the President's letter is extraordinary. He states that the existence of such a committee would render his task of conducting the war practically impossible. Of course, if that is correct, no one would for a moment favor such a committee; but I can not but suspect that the President in making that statement did not have in mind how limited the power of this committee was. He compares it to the Committee on the Conduct of the War during the Lincoln administration, but this committee has no such jurisdiction. It is strictly limited to investigation of expenditures. Let me quote the amendment:

SEC. 23. A joint committee of the Senate and House of Representatives shall be appointed, composed of five Members of the Senate, including three Democrats and two Republicans, and five Members of the House of Representatives, including three Democrats and two Republicans, to be known as "the joint committee on expenditures in the conduct of the war."

It shall be the duty of said committee to keep itself advised with regard to the expenditure of all appropriations bearing on the conduct of the war made by Congress and the contracts relating thereto made by officers of the executive departments, and it shall be the duty of the executive departments, on request, to keep said committee fully advised as to such expenditures and contracts.

Such committee shall confer and advise with the President of the United States and the heads of the various executive departments, commissions, voluntary boards, or other organizations connected with the conduct of the war, with a view to safeguarding expenditures, and shall report to Congress from time to time in its own discretion, or when requested to do so by either branch of Congress.

The membership of such committee shall be designated by the respective committees of the Senate and House which select the members of the regular standing committees.

Such committee shall have power to act by subcommittee or otherwise, and to send for persons and papers, and administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such clerical, expert, and stenographic assistance as shall be necessary; and to pay the necessary expenses of such committee there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, to be paid out upon the audit and order of the chairman or acting chairman of said committee.

How that could seriously hamper an Executive it is impossible for me to conceive. It might sometimes cause inconvenience and perhaps be troublesome, but in this case, when a majority of the committee would be of the President's own party, even that could hardly be true. I should think an Executive would welcome the oversight of a committee of the appropriating body over the expenses, as it would tend to safeguard against errors and graft; but whether welcome or unwelcome, inasmuch as it could do nothing but keep advised as to the contracts and expenditures which were made, and had no power at all over any Executive action or to prevent or veto any contract or expenditure, but simply exists for the purpose of getting information, it seems to me impossible that it could seriously impair Executive freedom or in any way interfere with the conduct of the war, and it creates a suspicion that the President, weighed down with more important duties, did not have time to read the amendment himself, but accepted its contents at secondhand from some one who misled him.

If the creation of this committee indicates lack of confidence in the President or prevents the successful prosecution of the war, why does not the same hold true of the expenditure committees of this House as they now exist? The rules now give to those committees the following powers:

The examination of the accounts and expenditures of the several departments of the Government and the manner of keeping the same; the economy, justness, and correctness of such expenditures; their conformity with appropriation laws; the proper application of public moneys; the security of the Government against unjust and extravagant demands; retrenchment; the enforcement of the payment of moneys due to the United States; the economy and accountability of public officers; the abolishment of useless offices; the reduction or increase of the pay of officers, shall all be subjects within the jurisdiction of the nine standing committees on the public expenditures in the several departments.

Those committees have to-day quite as much power as is given to this joint committee. The question may be asked, Why, then, is this joint committee necessary? Because these committees are by long habit inactive and dormant, while this new joint committee will occupy such a responsible place as the organ of the two branches of Congress that I think it would feel obliged to at least make a pretense of performing the duties imposed upon it, although with a majority in sympathy with the administration they would have no inclination to expose any extravagances or scandals which were not unquestioned.

I regret that the House conferees have been unwilling to allow this House to express itself on this amendment either by vote or by debate and have insisted that it should not be separately considered. And I regret that when the question arose between the power and rights of Congress and the power of the Executive they have refused to even consult the body which they represent, but have eagerly rushed to ask the opinions and wishes of the Executive and then availed themselves of the arbitrary rules of the House to aggrandize the Executive and to minimize their own body.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized in my own right for five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. JONES of Virginia). The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, we have listened to a very remarkable story of complaint and scolding from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT]. He scolds because we have not had unlimited time in which to debate a proposition which is not before the House, because it is not in conference at all.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield a moment?

Mr. LEVER. I prefer not to yield. I did not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. GILLETT. What I complained of was that you did not give us a minute of time to debate it when it was before the House.

Mr. LEVER. When I waived my right to move the previous question at the end of one hour and asked unanimous consent that we have an hour and a half of debate upon this conference report the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] gave his acquiescence to that, and we got unanimous consent to close the debate in one hour and thirty minutes, and yet the gentleman complains that he has not had time to debate this proposition. Well, there is no such proposition pending in this conference report, touching which the gentleman spent 15 minutes in making a speech which he concluded just a moment ago.

The bill came back to the House with Senate amendments, one of which provided for the creation of a committee to investigate various and sundry things connected with the conduct of the war. By a vote of the House of 101 to 169 the House conferees were practically instructed, to stand out against that provision, and we did stand out against it. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. We won in our contention. That provision is not in this conference report, and it is a credit to the House conferees that they upheld the hands of the House in this struggle between the two bodies, and it comes with poor grace from the gentleman from Massachusetts, who has been here for 20 years, representing this House in its struggles from time to time with the Senate, for the gentleman to criticize me personally or the House conferees for doing the bidding of the House of Representatives in standing by its own bill and securing the elimination of an extraneous proposition. [Applause.] It seems to me that it would come with better grace from the gentleman from Massachusetts, with his long service here, to stand upon the floor of the House and congratulate the House conferees in their conduct of this bill in conference, because I think we can say that the bill has come back to the House in all of its substantial provisions as it left the House. [Applause.]

The gentleman complains that I should ask the President his opinion about a proposition of this character. The gentleman seems to fail to realize that this country is in the greatest struggle in all the history of time, and that the President of the United States is the constitutional leader of the people of America in this great conflict. [Applause.] Here was a proposition which, to my mind, would shackle him hand and foot, and as a Member of the House and as an American citizen I took the liberty of asking the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy of the United States if he thought such a provision would affect his conduct of the war in any way badly, and he replied in the most vigorous terms that it would do so [applause]; and representing this House, representing the almost unanimous concensus of opinion of the American people, we have stood back of the President, and I have no apologies either for the victory of the conferees or for the fact that I consulted the constitutional head of our Government. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS].

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, it will be impossible for me in the limited time allotted to say what I have in mind regarding this bill. I have participated so little in the debate, however, that I am unwilling to permit a vote without a brief expression of my views.

I expect to support the measure because I believe the stress of circumstances not only justify the act but in fact demand it or some similar legislation. My criticism is not against the bill, but I do desire to condemn the publicity campaign, carried on at Government expense, which has so deceived the Nation as to the purpose of the measure and the probable result of its practical operation.

This bill is justified only as a military necessity. It would not have been proposed nor would it have an advocate in this Chamber if it were not for the extraordinary conditions of the hour. Its provisions are so revolutionary that its proponents seem to have feared its reception by the Nation, and doubtless for that reason a press agent has been busy for many weeks, not only flooding the mails with foolish and fulsome articles regarding "the miracle man" who is to administer it but with predictions as to its purposes and probable accomplishments that in many instances amount to absolute misstatement. As a result of this campaign every Congressman has received hundreds of letters from those who are distressed by the high cost of food products appealing to them to support this measure as the means of relief from the present almost intolerable economic conditions in America. I can imagine nothing more cruel than the raising of such false hopes. On the other hand, the farmer has been taught to believe that the bill is designed to stimulate production by offering him greater rewards for the fruits of his toil. Many Nebraska farmers have written me urging haste in the enactment of this bill as calculated to benefit them.

In my judgment this legislation is to prove the greatest disappointment of this session. Not because it will not accomplish the purpose of its enactment, but because it will accomplish the purpose of its enactment and because that purpose is exactly the reverse of what the Nation has been educated to expect. This bill is not designed to benefit the American producer nor the American consumer. It will quite likely cause sacrifice on the part of both. It is designed with the single purpose of relieving the food shortage among the allied powers as an absolute military necessity, and any other operative effect will be merely incidental to the main object.

It is amazing to me how the press bureau of this food administration has been able to convince the farmer that he is to get a higher price for his products as a result of this legislation and at the same time convince the laboring man that he is to buy these same products for less money. I am unable to comprehend the mental operations of men who contend that the bill will at once stimulate production and reduce prices. My observation of human nature prevents me from believing that you can stimulate production by reducing the price to the producer.

I have never entertained great faith in the ability of a legislative body to re-create humanity, nor to repeal natural law. The laws which control this universe are founded in the eternal equities and are in harmony with every fact, every incident, every other law of existence. The circumstance has never been nor never will it be upon which the operation of natural law will disturb the equilibrium. This bill not only seeks to interfere with the due operation of the fundamental law of supply and demand as a factor in prices, but it substitutes in its stead a law of our own making.

The law of supply and demand furnishes a great conduit through which products will flow from the producer to the consumer if not interfered with. If one through avarice or other unworthy motive seeks to retard the flow by obstruction and thereby corner the market, I favor the most drastic legislation not only to remove the obstruction, but to punish him who erects it. Such legislation is in harmony with the operation of natural law. I am therefore unqualifiedly in favor of the provisions of this measure which seek to prevent speculation in food products and to punish speculators. I can imagine no more despicable and unpatriotic man than he who under present conditions seeks to coin dollars out of the necessities and hunger of the poor. But this legislation does not stop there. It provides that competitive buying for the products of the farm shall cease and that a single agency shall purchase for America and the allied powers. It provides further that consumption at home shall be reduced to a minimum and that our citizens generally are to be encouraged to consume as little as possible of those things raised on the farm. The natural and legitimate demand is to be curtailed by legislative mandate. If the matter were left here, reenforced as it is by the embargo on shipments to neutral countries, the legislation would defeat its sole purpose, which is to increase the supply of wheat and flour for military needs. If demand were discouraged and destroyed, the result would inevitably show in a decreased supply. It was to prevent, or to minimize, such result that a minimum price for wheat is established. It looks like legislating in a circle, but the situation discloses that the author of the measure has not been without ingenuity.

Two dollars a bushel for wheat is a very high price under normal conditions. Wheat is now selling for a higher price, and if demand were not interfered with would doubtless sell much higher before the next crop season. If under normal conditions wheat were selling for $2 a bushel, the wheat acreage would be greatly increased and the supply vastly enlarged. This increased supply would result in a lower price, but under the operation of this act the operation of the natural law is superseded by the provision that the price can not go below $2 a bushel. This minimum price is offered, in part, with the hope that it will stimulate production. You can not increase the wheat acreage in those sections of the country where wheat is the only crop. The prevailing price has accomplished everything that a high price can accomplish. If the wheat acreage is increased, as the proponents of the bill contend, such increase must come from those sections which raise more than one crop. Grant that the minimum-price section will stimulate production and result in a larger acreage, what is the result? Necessarily less land will be in corn, oats, barley, rye, potatoes, and pasture, and this means less of these products, less of live stock, less of milk, cheese, and butter. To decrease the supply of these products means higher prices for them than even now prevails. I have it upon excellent authority that "man can not live by bread alone," and I wonder what the laboring man will think of those who convinced him that this bill would reduce the high cost of living when the situation is brought home to him.

I am not certain that the guaranty of $2 wheat is to prove the stimulus so devoutly hoped. If the minimum-price feature operates as it has done in other countries, it will, as a rule, be the maximum price as well. The Nebraska farmer can not afford to raise $2 wheat with corn at the current price. I would not care to hazard the prediction that the minimum price will be approximately the maximum price, because I doubt if it will; but if the stimulus is such that the wheat acreage is greatly increased and the supply very materially enlarged, these facts, in connection with the interference with competitive buying, the reduced consumption at home, and the embargo may produce that result. That my views are shared by those who are loudest in their support of this measure is at least indicated by the almost hysterical condition of certain Members of Congress when cotton was placed alongside wheat in the bill. The cotton growers and their representatives became very active, and as a result of their activity cotton quietly slipped out of the legislation in the Senate and the southern farmer will be permitted to reap the vast reward the abnormal conditions furnish.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. With pleasure.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I have been informed that with the price of wheat fixed at $2 a bushel it will mean flour will sell at $12.50 a barrel in the large cities.

Mr. REAVIS. Of that I am not certain, but I believe the statement is approximately correct. I will say, however, that I believe the wheat farmer would get $5 a bushel if there were no interference with the demand.

The statement has been frequently made both in Congress and in the press that the delay in passing this act results from the opposition of the farmers. This statement is unqualifiedly false. I represent an agricultural district and I have not received a single protest against the measure. The Nebraska farmer realizes how essential food is to our success in this war, and that without it in abundance disaster would probably ensue. Those who have written me regarding the apparent injustice of the measure in segregating them as the object of hostile legislation have recognized the apparent injustice as one of circumstance and not of design, and have asked for the speedy enactment of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is designed solely to increase the food supply essential to our success in this war. Its purpose is found in the military necessity. The feeling, so earnestly fostered by a press bureau, that it is to better economic conditions at home is not justified by the facts, and I can not support the measure without frankly stating my views. I earnestly hope and believe that it will tend to hasten the end of the appalling conflict in which we have entered, and that it will aid us in furnishing at all times a sufficient food supply for those brave boys who are to fight for our liberties and our security on the other side of the sea. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I think it a great mistake that the conferees on this measure have seen fit to eliminate section 23 as the same passed the Senate.

I regret also that there has been so much misunderstanding concerning the purposes of this section and that so much confusion has arisen by comparing it with the law passed during the Civil War, creating a Committee on the Conduct of the War of the Rebellion. I also regret that the attitude occupied by President Lincoln with reference to the committee just referred to has been so woefully misrepresented.

The Committee on the Conduct of the Civil War had for its purpose what its title indicated. It had to do with the policy and conduct of the war solely.

An examination of the report filed by Senator Benjamin F. Wade and submitted by him to the Thirty-eighth Congress, discloses to some degree the great scope of authority vested in that committee. In this report Senator Wade, among other things, says:

> The investigations of your committee have embraced many subjects. The results of their investigations under the directions of the Thirty-seventh Congress have already been made public. The subjects of their inquiry under the directions of the Thirty-eighth Congress, some of which have already been reported upon, include the following: Army of the Potomac, Battle of Petersburg, Red River expedition, Fort Fisher expedition, massacre at Fort Pillow, heavy ordnance, light-draft monitors, rebel treatment of prisoners, and massacre of Cheyenne Indians, all of which are or have been specially reported upon. Testimony has been taken upon other subjects which is submitted without reports, either because of the incomplete character of the evidence or because special reports were not necessary.

There was absolutely nothing in the Senate amendment to the pending food-control bill to warrant the comparison that has been made between it and the Civil War committee. The only purpose of the Senate amendment, as provided in section 23 is to create a committee on expenditures in the conduct of the war and has absolutely nothing to do with the policy of the administration in the conduct of ways or with the conduct of generals or other officers in carrying out the policy of the administration. It is limited entirely to expenditures, and all that has been said with reference to the opinion entertained by President Lincoln as to the Committee on the Conduct of the Civil War is beside the mark. And in order to defeat this Senate amendment the opinion of Mr. Lincoln with reference to his war committee has likewise been misrepresented and falsified. All histories of the Civil War without a single exception, so far as I have been able to find, have commended that committee and set forth in no uncertain terms the approval of President Lincoln of the same. W. O. Stoddard, the historian, was not only contemporary of the martyred President, but he was as close to him during the days of the Civil War as any living man, with the possible exception of John Hay. Both of these gentlemen were secretaries at the White House during this period. Mr. Stoddard did not have to depend for his facts upon hearsay or upon perusing the writings of others. He got his impressions at first-hand from actual contact with the President of the United States and with the men who composed the Commitee on the Conduct of the Civil War. And this is what he has to say upon this subject:

> It was not long before the "legislative branch" of the Government began to interfere with the "executive branch" in military matters. It was little more patriotic than constitutional, but Mr. Lincoln had no manner of objection. When, in December, 1861, Congress appointed a strong and capable "Committee on the Conduct of the War," its members were at once taken into hearty and intimate consultation. What would surely have been a peril or a hindrance to a weak or selfish ruler was transformed at once into an additional and powerful guaranty of congressional cooperation. It was not so much thenceforward that Congress had assumed a part of the Executive province, but that the Executive had deftly provided himself with personal and official representatives upon the floor of Senate and House.
> This committee, constantly advised with, cordially invited to investigate, to consider, to come, and to go, and to know everything before it happened, became a priceless safety valve for the growing discontent over inexplicable delays. Without it there can now be but little question that Mr. Lincoln would have been more seriously misunderstood and even antagonized by the body of men nominally represented by the committee.
> The President of the United States is constitutionally the Commander in Chief, and Abraham Lincoln was also actually dictator; but he was entirely at ease as to all his rights and dignities when a joint committee of Senators and Representatives freely summoned before them his military officers by the dozen and called for their views of things in general and their professional opinions of battles and campaigns. He knew beforehand that the sure result would be the strong and unanimous sympathy of that "jury" of clear-headed men, with him personally, and their approval of the general outlines of his policy, however much they might disagree among themselves or with him as to details of specific operations.

I think it is generally conceded that the most trustworthy life and history of Lincoln that has ever been written is that by Nicolay and Hay. This history sets forth more fully and at greater detail the personal opinions of Lincoln and his views respecting conditions during the war than any other history, and nowhere in this Life of Lincoln can a single word of complaint or criticism emanating from President Lincoln be found with reference to the committee on the conduct of the Civil War. On the other hand, these historians in giving their estimate of this committee as held by the public and that they knew Mr. Lincoln entertained concerning it, have expressed themselves as follows:

This committee, known as the committee on the conduct of the war, was for four years one of the most important agencies in the country. It assumed, and was sustained by Congress in assuming, a great range of prerogative. It became a stern and zealous censor of both the Army and the Government; it called soldiers and statesmen before it and questioned them like refractory schoolboys. It claimed to speak for the loyal people of the United States, and this claim generally met with the sympathy and support of a majority of the people's representatives in Congress assembled. It was often hasty and unjust in its judgment, but always earnest, patriotic, and honest; it was assailed with furious denunciation and defended with headlong and indiscriminating eulogy, and on the whole it must be said to have merited more praise than blame. (Vol. V, pp. 150, 151.)

You will observe by reading what Stoddard and Nicolay and Hay have said in their histories upon this subject that the Civil War committee had very little if anything to do with the expenditures incident to the Civil War, but they had much to do with the policy and actual conduct of the war, while the committee proposed to be created by the Senate amendment to this food-control bill has absolutely nothing to do with the conduct of this war, and has only to do with the expenditures incident thereto.

President Wilson is a historian of note himself. He has written a history of the Civil War, and you may search that history from beginning to end and you will find no criticism therein of the Civil War committee that we have been discussing. In fact, you will find no mention of that committee at all in his history. Had that committee been the great stumbling block in the way of President Lincoln to the proper conduct of the Civil War, it is only fair to presume that Mr. Wilson would have discovered that fact and made some mention of it in his history of that great struggle.

I do not think that it should take a great amount of argument to convince any fair and unprejudiced mind that there is necessity now, and that there will be a growing necessity, for the character of committee provided for in the Senate amendment. Already has the Congress appropriated and authorized the expenditure of ten billions of dollars and, in all probability, before this present session adjourns the expenditure of five billions more will be authorized. These appropriations have been made by the Members of this Congress as representatives of the people and the people will have these staggering sums to pay. Are they not entitled to know how they are expended, whether wisely or unwisely?

Immediately after our entering into this war this Congress turned over millions and millions of the public money to the Treasurer of the United States to be loaned and spent by him at his own discretion, without any check whatever, and the people of the United States who have this burden to bear do not know and never will know, in all probability, how this money has been expended. It has become known to a few, however, that $400,000,000 of this money was handed over to the firm of J. P. Morgan & Co in payment of advance credits which that concern had made to foreign governments. I do not believe that the people of the United States who will have to bend their backs to bear the additional burden of taxation would have given their stamp of approval to this transaction. And this is only one of many transactions involving millions that have been kept from the people and concerning which they are entitled to the fullest information.

If a committee similar to that provided for in the Senate amendment had been created at the commencement of this war, millions of dollars would have been saved to the people in the letting of public contracts for the building of cantonments and other Government works, and would have prevented the public scandal that now exists with reference to many of these contracts. Time forbids my entering into any considerable discussion of this proposition, but I do want to call the attention of the House to some conditions that are prevailing at Indianapolis, Ind., in the construction that is now going on at Fort Benjamin Harrison. And what can be said with reference to conditions there can likewise be truthfully said with reference to conditions prevailing in many other sections of the country, for these contracts in the main are alike. The contract for the construction work at Fort Benjamin Harrison was let to the Gaylord Construction Co., the contractors to receive the full amount of the cost of construction plus a profit of 10 per cent. Immediately these contractors, proceeding upon the theory of the more cost the more profit, increased the cost account by paying not only the most exorbitant prices for material but the amounts that they have paid and are paying for labor are outrageous and unjustifiable. Items taken from the pay roll of the Gaylord Construction Co. disclose the amounts paid by these gentlemen to their workmen, as follows, figures being compensation for two weeks' services: Carpenter, $167.04; foreman plumbers' gang, $169.13; cement worker, $146.25; plumber, $212.63; superintendent of laborers, $151.30; sawyer, $145.50; lumber checkers, whose only business was to count pieces of lumber, paid $168 to $175 per month; and foreman of common laborers paid from $200 to $250 per month. Plumbers are paid from $9 to $12 per day, and the work of many of these plumbers was rendered in carrying pipe and laying the same down along trenches. Ordinary carpenters are paid $9 to $10 per day, and boys from 14 to 16 years of age paid $3.75 and $4 per day for carrying drinking water to the workmen. Eight hours is taken as the basis of a full day's work. An hour, however, out of this is allowed to the mechanics in going out to Fort Benjamin Harrison from Indianapolis, another hour is allowed in the evening for their return to the city, and one-half hour is allowed for luncheon. So there are but five and a half hours left in which these workmen pretend even to labor. These are but a few samples of the many that might be pointed out to show how the public money has been and is being wasted on this contract.

It is now known that public contracts based upon this scheme of the entire cost of the contractor plus 10 per cent profit have been let to men who were guilty of robbing the Canadian Government and who upon discovery were drummed out of that country and forbidden to ever come back again. If we had a committee on expenditures incident to this war, composed of the high-class men who would be appointed under the terms of the Senate amendment, is there anyone who believes for a moment that such expenditures as I have enumerated would be tolerated or that contractors without some warrant as to their integrity would be permitted to secure these Government contracts?

Instead of objecting to the creation of this committee the administration should welcome it. It is physically impossible for the President of the United States or for the heads of the various departments to supervise these contracts or to give the expenditures incident thereto the scrutinizing care that they deserve. Their duties, already multifarious, will increase from day to day, and I would think that they would be glad to see transferred to a responsible body the very important duty of seeing that the public money is properly and honestly expended.

In these trying times one of the greatest assets that the administration can have is the confidence of the people. That confidence can best be secured by seeing to it that the people's money is not wasted. The people will be patient and long suffering and bear almost any burden so long as they know that their substance is not being cast into the graft maws of public contractors. But not long will they patiently endure after they are convinced that their hard-earned dollars are being worse than wasted; and the confidence of the people once destroyed is not easily restored.

The very fact that such a committee as provided for in the Senate amendment was created would of itself be a check upon the rapacity of the men who seek to make extraordinary profits out of war contracts and who are taking advantage of existing conditions to enrich themselves, and many practices that are now boldly resorted to would not even be thought of. I hold in my hand a copy of Ordnance Pamphlet No. 368, revised March 16, 1917, which purports to be instructions for marking and painting ammunition for the United States naval service of projectiles as furnished by manufacturers. This pamphlet contains the specifications and requirements for painting projectiles, setting forth with considerable detail how the painting is to be done and the various color schemes and the quality of paint that should be used in doing the work, and on page 3 of this pamphlet we find this remarkable clause embodied in these specifications:

Cebaline paint No. 2, manufactured by the Miller & McLean Co., New York City, is a satisfactory paint.

This is but a sample of the graft that is going on and being permitted in some of the branches of our Government. Anyone seeking to obtain a contract, as provided for in the specifications that I have just referred to, would take the hint at once that in order to stand any show whatever of obtaining a contract under these plans and specifications would have to specify in his proposal that he would use "Cebaline Paint No. 2, manufactured by the Miller & McLean Co., New York City." If we had a committee such as provided for in this Senate amendment, I dare say that there would be no more special advertisements such as the one referred to in public specifications issuing from governmental offices of the United States.

I do hope for the best interests of the Government and its good name and for the saving of the people's money that the Senate amendment which the conferees have seen fit to eliminate from this bill, if not finally placed back in the same, will be consummated in a separate law.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we are to consider and pass upon the conference reports on the two bills referring to food production and control. The first bill presented and considered, H. R. 4188, is known as the food-survey or food-census bill. It passed the House May 28, 1917.

FOOD-SURVEY BILL.

This bill is an administration bill. It was prepared by the Department of Agriculture and had the approval of the President. It is distinctively a war measure. Its main features as it comes to us now are:

Provisions for an investigation by the Department of Agriculture as to the demand, supply, cost of production, and methods of distribution of foods, feeds, seeds, fertilizers, agricultural implements, and so forth, now in the country.

It authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture in case of "special need in any restricted area for seed" to purchase such seed and sell to the farmers at cost.

It makes large additional appropriations for expenditures by the Department of Agriculture for encouragement to live-stock production, for educational and demonstrational work, for the conservation of all forms of food products, and for other purposes.

It admits tick-infected cattle from Mexico and South America under certain conditions.

The bill also contains several other provisions of minor importance.

A FOOD CENSUS.

It was the opinion of the advisers of the administration that the first step necessary to take was an invoice of the Nation's supply of food products. This had been done in some European countries and had been found valuable as a basis for regulation. It is apparent now that such a survey in this country will be practically impossible. Our territorial extent and the diversity and amount of our resources are so vast that an invoice of our food supplies would be an immense undertaking and require a great deal of time. Besides our production is constantly increasing from month to month and our home consumption is so vast and so variable that unless a census could be taken all over the country at a fixed date anything like an accurate survey would be impossible. In European countries of small territorial extent and comparatively limited production the task is much easier. With tens of thousands of warehouses, and with millions of individual granaries with constant augmentations and withdrawals the task would appear hopeless.

Neither does it seem so necessary as would appear. From national and State organizations we secure reports of supplies and crop conditions, which, while only estimates, are, after all, approximately correct, and are always available. These are of sufficient accuracy on which to base any governmental action which it may be necessary to take.

After all, whatever our supplies, it will be necessary to augment them as much as possible. The extreme of effort is demanded whether the supplies are large or small.

For these reasons it is not probable that much benefit will result from the food-census provision.

EXTRAVAGANCE.

There were many objections to the bill as originally introduced. Happily, during debate, many of the objectionable features have been eliminated. As the bill came from the department it provided for a lump-sum appropriation of $25,000,000, to be spent principally, as shown in the hearings, in employing an army of so-called "experts," 7,000 in number, to go about the country telling the farmers how to raise their crops and the farmers' wives how to cook. It was stated that great saving could be made if the experts could go about and teach the farmers' wives how to make corn bread and cottage cheese!

The absurdity of such a proposition enabled the committee to reduce the amount to about $18,000,000, and this amount was still further reduced during debate until the amount now carried is about $12,000,000, or less than half the amount originally demanded.

The temptation on the part of the administrative branches of the Government to make extravagant demands for appropriations in times like these is great. The temptation on the part of Congress to grant whatever is demanded as a war measure is likewise great. But if this were done, if Congress did not stand guard over the Treasury, if it did not carefully scrutinize the estimates and debate the demands made there would be a veritable riot of extravagance, the money obtained from the people by extraordinary and burdensome taxes would be wasted and the efficiency of administration impaired.

The present is an instance in point. The sum of $12,000,000, which if appropriated would have been worse than wasted, has been saved by a careful examination by Congress of the way it was proposed to expend it. No one now would propose such an appropriation for such a purpose. An ostentatious display of expenditures seems to be characteristic of administrators. They profess economy and then boast of the amount of money they spend. During war times these characteristics seem accentuated. The officials seem to consider it a patriotic duty to see how much money can be spent to save the country. It is a singular delusion that it is our duty to save everything except money. That may be spent, in the opinion of some, without restraint, lavishly, indiscriminately. The thought seems to be that we have plenty of money and can get all we want, therefore we should spend and spend freely. We are the richest Nation in the world and don't need to be careful of our money!

ADMISSION OF TICK-INFECTED CATTLE.

The provision which was ingrafted on the bill by a Senate amendment allowing the importation of tick-infected cattle from Mexico and South America is a dangerous provision and should have been defeated in conference. The danger of spreading the infection is greatly lessened, however, by the provision secured by the House conferees which requires the infected cattle to be slaughtered at the port of entry. Still the provision is otherwise objectionable and should not have been inserted.

FOOD-CONTROL BILL.

H. R. 4961, known as the food-control bill, was introduced June 11, 1917. It passed the House June 23. It passed the Senate and went to conference July 21. As reported from the conference committee its principal features are:

Provisions for governmental control during the war of foods, feeds, fuel, including fuel oil and natural gas, fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients, machinery, and equipment required for the production of foods, feeds, and fuel, and gives the President authority to issue orders to carry out the provisions of the act.

The Senate adopted an amendment to this section which provided for the appointment of a board of food administration to consist of three commissioners. The conference committee refused to approve of this amendment and struck it out, thus leaving the power exclusively in the hands of the President. It is understood this will mean the appointment of Mr. Herbert Hoover as sole food administrator, who will exercise all the powers conferred by the act upon the President.

The President is authorized to select any agencies he desires and to accept the services of persons who desire to act without compensation. But no person can act for the Government in any contract or transaction who has any pecuniary interest in such contract or transaction.

Whenever the President shall so determine, he may announce that no person shall thereafter engage in the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of foods, feeds, or fuel without securing a Government license, and if the President shall find any storage charge, commission, profit, or practice unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, unfair, or wasteful, he may order such practice modified or stopped; and if the licensee does not comply, his license may be revoked, and he is made subject to fine and imprisonment. This section is not to apply to farmers or gardeners.

Hoarding of foods, feeds, or fuel is defined and is made a crime subject to punishment. The willful destruction of such articles for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply is also made unlawful. It is also made unlawful to conspire with others to limit the production or restrict the supply in order to enhance the price.

The President is authorized to requisition foods, feeds, fuels, and other supplies necessary for the Army and Navy, or any other public use connected with the common defense, and to ascertain and pay a just compensation therefor.

The President, at his discretion, is authorized to purchase, store, and sell for cash, at reasonable prices, wheat, flour, beans, and potatoes.

The President is authorized to requisition and take over for use or operation by the Government any factory, packing house, oil pipe line, mine, or other plant, and to operate the same. Just compensation shall be made for such taking over and use.

The President is authorized to prohibit or regulate the operations of boards of trade, exchanges, or other similar institutions, in order to prevent, correct, or remove unjust speculation, manipulation, or other evil practices.

The President is authorized to determine and fix in advance a guaranteed price for wheat for any year. The guaranteed price for 1918 for No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent is fixed by the terms of the act at $2 per bushel. This special guaranty is not dependent upon action by the President.

Thirty days from the date of the approval of the act no foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds shall be used in the production of distilled spirits for beverage purposes, nor shall there be imported any distilled spirits. Whenever the President shall deem it necessary he may limit, regulate, or prohibit the use of food materials for malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes.

The President is authorized to take over all distilled spirits in bond or in stock for redistillation for governmental purposes in the manufacture of military and hospital supplies and to pay a just compensation therefor.

The President is authorized to fix the prices at which coal and coke shall be sold and to establish rules for their production, sale, shipment, and disposition. If any producer or dealer does not conform to the requirements fixed, the President is authorized to take over his mine or plant and to operate it under governmental control, paying a just compensation therefor. The President is also authorized to require such producers to sell their entire product to the Government, which may use or sell such products as it may determine necessary.

DELAY.

Much complaint has been made because of the delay in the passage of this legislation. If there is legitimate cause of complaint because of delay, it certainly can not be charged to the House. The first bill passed the House May 28, 1917. The second bill passed the House June 23. As soon as the bills passed the Senate they were sent to conference, and we will today approve both conference reports. Certainly whatever delay has occurred can not be attributed to the House.

It must be apparent now that it was a mistake to separate these food bills. The purpose of separating them was to expedite their passage. The result was directly the opposite. The consideration of two bills along parallel lines, containing provisions many of them intended to accomplish the same result, has resulted in delaying legislation rather than facilitating it.

The demand so generally expressed for the immediate passage by Congress, without consideration and without debate, of all bills introduced which have administrative approval is unjustifiable and dangerous. Legislation of such transcendent importance must be considered and debated if the interests of the country and the people are to be regarded. The President approves the object and purpose of the intended legislation and acts on the presumption that the bills introduced will accomplish such object and purpose. But the President does not examine and pass upon the bills as to their terms and conditions until Congress has acted and he is called upon to approve or disapprove of them. Bills of this nature are prepared in the departments. It is the business of Congress to consider, first, whether the legislation is desirable or necessary, and, second, if it approves the legislation, to consider and debate its provisions in order to carry out its intended purpose. Only thus can legislation be perfected and extravagance prevented. Congress is doing not only a commendable but an absolutely necessary work in perfecting as nearly as is possible the vital legislation proposed and in guarding the Treasury. It would be calamitous if under administrative pressure or popular clamor Congress should cease to exercise its constitutional duty in the consideration and passage of war legislation.

THE TWO COMMITTEES.

Two amendments made by the Senate and rejected by the conference committee have been the subject of much comment and discussion.

One of these amendments directed the President to appoint a board of food administration to consist of three commissioners who should "perform such duties in carrying out the purposes of this act as the President shall direct." It was expected that Mr. Hoover would be one of these commissioners and the chairman of the board, but it was intended that by appointing two associate members some check on his authority would be obtained.

This amendment was strenuously opposed by the President and administration supporters as intended to hamper the President and embarrass Mr. Hoover. It was urged that dissentions in the board would impede the operation of the law and decrease its efficiency.

On the other hand the supporters of the amendment urged that while Mr. Hoover was doubtless an able man and exceptionally qualified for the work, he had been 20 years outside the country and could not know existing conditions as well as was desirable. It was thought that two associates, selected by the President, who would know better our needs and conditions and who would be in entire harmony with the President's policies, could effectively aid in carrying out the provisions of the law.

The other amendment proposed the creation of a "joint committee on expenditures in the conduct of the war" to be composed of five Members of the Senate and five Members of the House, a majority of each to be Democrats. The principal duty of this committee was "to keep itself advised with regard to the expenditures of all appropriations bearing on the conduct of the war made by Congress."

This amendment was likewise disapproved by the President, who stated that its adoption would be considered by him as an expression of a lack of confidence in his leadership. While this view was hardly justified, the country would probably have taken the President's view and considered that Congress had refused to trust the President in his conduct of the war.

It is perhaps best that both these amendments failed at this time. In the tremendous undertaking which the President assumes, he should be given a free hand, and as far as possible be made to feel that he is not hampered by restrictions which he considers would seriously hinder his successful prosecution of the war.

There were many who believed that both amendments should have been retained but who did not wish to throw any impediment in the way of the undertaking. A fair trial without restrictions, and just as the President desires, can thus be obtained, and if modifications are necessary they can be secured by further legislation.

PRICE FIXING AND THE $2 GUARANTY ON WHEAT.

It is, of course, understood that the object of this legislation is to secure for the Government and for the people cheaper food products. Everyone who has the slightest knowledge of economic history knows that wars cause high prices, not only of food products but of all commodities. This is an acknowledged economic law. It is useless to endeavor to prevent the operation of such a law. To decrease the number of producers and to increase the number of consumers as well as to increase enormously the demand for exclusively war material will inevitably bring about a rise in prices.

The farmer is merely one of the producing classes. With others he receives higher prices during war time for his products. To that extent he is benefited. But the farmer is not only a producer, he is a consumer as well. He is compelled to buy fertilizers, farm implements, harness, clothing, groceries, fuel, and all that is necessary both to carry on his business and to support his family. If he receives higher prices for his products he is enabled to pay high prices for the things he is compelled to buy. In the general scale he is enabled to hold his place if his products share in the general rise of prices.

It does not require argument to show that if the farmer's prices are to be fixed on a low scale in order to secure cheap food products, while the prices of everything else are allowed to rise without restriction, that the farmer is placed at a disadvantage. It is unjust to him to be compelled to sell all he produces at low prices, and compel him to buy everything he has to purchase at inflated, unrestricted war prices.

Either there should be no restriction in the prices of any of the necessities of life or there should be restriction in all. For that reason I proposed an amendment giving the President power to fix prices on all necessaries as well as on farm products. This amendment was not adopted.

The advocates of a different policy disclaim any intent to do injustice to the farmer. To show their friendly attitude they have placed in the bill a guaranty of $2 per bushel for wheat. A suspicion might be entertained regarding the purpose of this provision, when it is remembered that wheat is now far beyond that price in the market, and if the war continues will probably go to a much higher price. A guaranty in such case would be a restriction, and operate against rather than in favor of the farmer.

But if it should under any circumstances operate as a stimulant to production, then the general effect would be injurious. There is an established relation between the prices of farm products which if disturbed always results disastrously. To guarantee the price of wheat at a price above the market, would cause an excessive planting of wheat. This would work injuriously on the meat and dairy producing interests. We are in greater danger of a famine in fats than in cereals.

There is the greatest danger that what has occurred with our allies will occur here. They have already slaughtered more than 33,000,000 head of their stock animals. This immense impairment of breeding capital is a double loss, and one that can not be repaired in time to help in the war.

This will make the demand for all meat products, animal fats, and dairy products greater in this country, while our supply is continually diminishing. Already the excessive price of feeds has caused the slaughtering of thousands of dairy cattle, when every dairy cow is as valuable to the Nation as a 10-inch gun. Already the excessive price of corn has caused tens of thousands of immature cattle and swine to be thrown on the market, to the permanent diminution of our meat supplies for next winter.

In some way, by some means, the slaughter of dairy cows and of immature cattle and swine should be prevented. If Mr. Hoover can devise means to accomplish this he will prove a national and international benefactor.

The fields of our allies will this year fall short of their normal yield, we are told, 500,000,000 bushels. They have never been able to feed themselves, even under normal conditions. It will be our task to keep their armies and people from starving this winter. That will be a tremendous undertaking. We have done what we could in the way of production. Our present and future duty is to eliminate waste, to preserve perishable products, and to utilize every possible device, both of scientific management and practical experience, to conserve all the food resources we have available.

It should be understood that our obligation to our allies does not arise from charitable or philanthropic grounds. They are fighting our battles for us. Their soldiers are our soldiers. Every victory won by the allies is our victory, and every defeat suffered is our defeat. To allow their strength to wane or their efforts to be impeded by lack of supplies prolongs the war, means the sacrifice of more American lives, and delays the coming of peace indefinitely.

TO PREVENT AND PUNISH HOARDING, STOCK GAMBLING, AND EVIL PRACTICES.

The bill contains ample, and I believe effective, provisions to prevent and punish hoarding, willful destruction, and market manipulation of food products for the purpose of enhancing prices and controlling the market. It also contains provisions to prevent stock gambling and injurious speculation in food products.

In this purpose I am in entire sympathy. While believing that a price-fixing policy on farmers' products without giving the Government power to control the prices of other necessaries is both unjust and an unwise interference with economic law, it is not only justifiable, but it is our duty, to prevent the food pirates, the board-of-trade gamblers, and the market manipulators from extorting exorbitant prices and profits from either the Government or the people.

It is because of these evil practices that our principal ground of complaint arises. War is of necessity a burden. It brings in its train injury and loss inevitably. But everything should be done to prevent these injuries from being intensified by evil, designing men—men who would sacrifice the Nation's life to further their own interests; men who would starve the poor or rob the afflicted to add to their ill-gathered profits. To get rich out of the war should be so certain a proof of dishonesty and dishonor as to drive every man who does so from the country he has betrayed and from the society of the people he has injured.

For these reasons I most heartily approve of the provisions of this legislation designed to prevent and punish these evil practices. So necessary and important do I consider these provisions that I support the bills containing them earnestly and heartily, although they contain provisions which I do not approve. He is neither a wise legislator nor a patriotic one who can not broaden his vision to see benefits as well as defects. If those benefits exceed in value the defects, it is not best to spend time in exaggerating the defects, discrediting the legislation, and preventing the passage of laws necessary to the conduct of the war and the preservation of the Nation.

There is one primary patriotic duty which rests on every business man during the war. It is to sell his product at cost plus a reasonable profit. To extort exorbitant profits because of war conditions is to impair the Nation's resources and to render aid to the enemy.

I approve unreservedly the President's declaration that the prices to the public must be the same as the prices to the Government. It would be very easy to make Government prices moderate and to offset this by exorbitant prices to the people. The trade chain will remain unbroken. If the Steel Corporation charges exorbitant prices to the implement maker, the implement maker will charge exorbitant prices to the dealer, and the dealer to the farmer. Then the farmer tries to get along with a worn-out implement, and the result is a lessened yield. There is but one golden rule now—reasonable prices all along the line.

Many will not be able to realize the necessity of the passage of these bills to the successful conduct of the war, yet everyone can realize the extreme difficulty of carrying out successfully their provisions. Their success or failure will depend on the manner of their administration. Many have been loath to confer such extreme power on an individual. They have felt, however, when told that such action was necessary that the Government might successfully carry on the war, that they could not refuse to give to the administration the power it deemed essential to success. Certainly the administration carries with it the hopes of all loyal Americans for such success. That such success may come, and come quickly, to bring the war to a triumphant conclusion, and so bring us a lasting peace, is the object of this legislation.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I shall support these conference reports.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McLEMORE].

Mr. McLEMORE. Mr. Speaker, I was one of a very small minority that voted against the food-control bill when it was before the House the first time, because it impressed me as being the most drastic, the most extraordinary, and the most un-American piece of legislation ever attempted by any American Congress. It was my hope that when the bill came back from the Senate and the conference committee it would be so amended that I could conscientiously give it my support and vote, but I have been disappointed, for the bill seems now to be in a worse condition than it was when it passed the House some weeks ago. To me it seems that the bill is intended only to control the price of American farm products in the interest of certain European nations. They call these nations our allies in the war in which we are now engaged, and as such I am willing to accept them. It may not be out of the way to call attention to the fact that the metropolitan papers and others which they influence are busy impressing it on the public mind that the allies are "helping us" to win this war. I am willing to go the limit in the prosecution of the war to a successful and speedy termination, now that war has been declared, but I do not think it necessary, in our effort to destroy autocracy and establish democracy in the nations of the Old World, that we should completely un-Americanize ourselves, destroy our own democracy, and create an autocracy in this country by far more powerful than that of which any Old World monarch ever dared to dream.

Mr. Speaker, this bill has many features that should cause American citizens to pause and reflect. It is unnecessary to point them out, for they stand out so boldly that even a blind man should see them. In one or two instances, however, I can not refrain from specializing. This bill carries with it the creation of a "food dictator" who is invested with autocratic powers greater than those ever conferred upon any Old World ruler. These powers will enable the "food dictator" to have absolute control of the farm products of the United States, and the farmer who dares disobey his dictates will find himself in serious trouble. And who is the man that has been selected to fill this most un-American, most extraordinary, and most autocratic position? Is he an all-American citizen, a man whose home, whose interests, and whose ideas are of and for this country? Mr. Speaker, he is not; but rather he is a man who has not been a resident of the United States for 20 years or more and who himself before the House Committee on Agriculture made this statement:

> Now, as to the problems in this country, I feel myself very much a stranger to my own country, as I have been away since the war began.

He did not tell us how long he had "been away" before the war began, but I can state authoritatively that he has not been a resident of the United States for all of 20 years. A portion of this time has been accounted for by the Merchants' Association of New York, which has been very active in behalf of the gentleman under discussion. In a letter written to me, under date of May 29, 1917, the association says:

> While we understand that Mr. Hoover is a man of considerable wealth, we have no knowledge of his having made his money in Wall Street. We understand he is a mining engineer; that he worked his way through the School of Mines at Stanford University; then went to Australia, from which country in four years he was called by the Chinese Government to take charge of its bureau of mines. After a year in that position, we are informed that he became manager of mining properties of a Belgian corporation in China, and a year later, because of his great success, was made a partner in a large British mining firm.

Here are six years of Mr. Hoover's absence from the United States accounted for prior to the war—four in Australia; a year in China, as the head of the Chinese bureau of mines; and then another year as the manager of a Belgian corporation in China. How long he has resided in England since becoming "a partner in a large British mining firm," the Merchants' Association of New York does not tell us and is silent on the subject; but from an authoritative source we have it that he formed business connections in London, England, in 1902, and that he has maintained his home and large business interests in that city ever since; and yet it is this man, a mining engineer, who has not been a citizen of the United States for all of 20 years and whose home and interests are all in a foreign land, who knows absolutely nothing of farming and of cattle raising, yet who has been brought over here to assume a dictatorship over our producers and invested with such autocratic powers that to disobey his mandates may mean prison walls for all who may dare offend. With a population of more than 100,000,000 to choose from, why was it necessary to go out of the United States to get a man to preside as dictator over our American producers and invest him with autocratic powers greater than those ever exercised by kaiser, emperor, or czar? Have we become so fallen that there is not one of our own citizens to be trusted with these autocratic powers, one whose interests are in the United States and whose ideals are for and of America?

But, Mr. Speaker, this is not all. Not only do we propose to make this "food dictator" by far the most powerful autocrat this country has ever seen, but the bill also carries with it an appropriation of $150,000,000 of the people's money, which will be placed at his disposal to do with as he pleases. In addition to this, we are to appropriate $2,500,000 for office forces, and so forth; and he also asks for the sum of $150,000 with which to erect an office building. If his dictatorship is to last only until the war is over, why spend this big sum of the people's money in erecting for him an office building? Is his request for a new building to be taken as an indication that the dictatorship is to be made permanent? I should judge so, Mr. Speaker, when it is generally believed in well-informed circles that the war will be over in three years at most.

Mr. Speaker, working through the organized women's clubs and other organizations, the literature of this new autocracy has been scattered broadcast throughout the country. The women are appealed to "to accept membership in the United States Food Administration," and the membership card that is sent to them to sign assures them that "there are no fees to be paid." At the bottom of the card, however, in fine type, we have this:

DIRECTIONS.

Mail your pledge card to the Food Administrator, Washington, D. C., and you will receive free your first instructions and a household tag to be hung in your window.

Upon receipt of 10 cents with your pledge card and a return addressed envelope, the official button of the administration, and if desired the shield insignia of the Food Administration, will also be sent you.

From the best that I can learn upon diligent inquiry these buttons cost the Hoover administration not exceeding a half cent each. There is another item, not noted on the card but concerning which information is imparted in another way, and which is that all ladies registering should wear a one-piece frock when in the kitchen and the pattern for which is furnished the ladies by the Hoover administration for the modest sum of 10 cents. These patterns, it is said, cost even less than the buttons. But this is not all. Those who purchase the patterns are informed that the one-piece frock should be made of a certain kind of cloth, and those who went to purchase the cloth in this city discovered that it had suddenly increased in price from 10 or 12 cents per yard to 18 cents, and they were informed that the price would soon be advanced to 25 cents per yard. This is what happened in Washington, Mr. Speaker, and it is reasonable to suppose that the merchants of other cities and towns throughout the country were as wise as those in Washington.

It is claimed by the Hoover administration, Mr. Speaker, that 1,000,000 women registered on the first registration day. It is presumed that the women who registered also "fell" for the button and pattern, in which event the Hooveristas took in $200,000 in money the first day. Estimates sent out from Hoover headquarters place the number of those who will register and "join the move" at 20,000,000. If each buys a button and pattern, and which each is expected to do in order to retain her standing with the Hoover administration, it means "a pick-up on the side" of the neat little sum of $4,000,000. Compared to some financial propositions that are now being pulled off by the Congress, this little sum of $4,000,000 is a very insignificant matter, but it is a straw which shows the way the wind blows, and is well worth keeping in mind. A fad of this kind, once well under way, with the proper machinery to push it along, develops "new ideas" each passing day, and each "idea" is supposed to add more money to the coffers of the organization responsible for the fad. Is it any wonder, then, that Mr. Herbert C. Hoover, of Red House, Hornton Street, London, England, should offer his services "free" to the American Government to accept the position of "food dictator" of the United States and clothed with autocratic powers greater than those ever conferred upon king, kaiser, or czar, with $150,000,000 of the people's money placed at his disposal to do with as he pleases?

Mr. Speaker, perhaps the most remarkable and most extraordinary thing that ever happened in the United States is found in the statement that Mr. Hoover has been made "food dictator" and clothed with great autocratic powers weeks before a bill has even been passed by Congress creating the office. He already has an army of assistants and clerks doing his bidding and has leased an entire hotel building, with its furnishings, etc., where he maintains his offices and where he and numerous assistants also maintain their homes. No eastern potentate ever exercised greater autocratic powers than those now being exercised by Mr. Herbert C. Hoover, of Red House, Hornton Street, London, England, and who, it seems, did not have to wait for Congress to act before assuming the rôle of food dictator and taking charge of the produce of 45,000,000 farmers of the United States. The least paid of the army of clerks he has employed at Government expense is $1,200 per year, so I am informed, and I believe authoritatively. Whether or not his lieutenants are paid salaries I do not know, but if these lieutenants are all in the class of the two he has taken from the State of Texas, then they do not need the money and can afford to show their patriotism by serving for glory on Mr. Hoover's official staff. One of these distinguished Texan lieutenants is a millionaire oil king and the other an alleged millionaire ranchman and the owner of the "greatest dairy in the world." The latter also had the distinction of being the Bull Moose nominee for governor of Texas in 1912, although since then he has, I believe, proclaimed himself a "Wilson Democrat." I have no criticism to make of these gentlemen and merely mention them to show the class of men the new autocrat is calling to his assistance to dictate to our country's producers, and that, too, under an administration which claims to be democratic and the friend of the plain people. Both of the gentlemen named have expressed themselves in print as being in favor of the Government taking charge of everything our farmers raise and produce, and evidently they are satisfied to let Mr. Herbert Hoover be the "food dictator" and clothed with autocratic powers never before dreamed of in the land of the free and which gave us George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, and Andrew Jackson.

Mr. Speaker, the Hoover administration is very busy these days advising the people to conserve their food, but we hear nothing about Congress conserving the people's money. If the so-called food administration keeps up as it has begun, it will, at the end of three years, have spent several hundred millions of dollars of the people's money, which money, if correctly applied, would be of far more benefit to the country than all the food administrations Mr. Hoover might suggest or devise. In fact, the so-called food administration is going to be one of the most expensive luxuries the people of this country have ever enjoyed and will prove a burden on the people under which they will groan for many a year to come.

Mr. Hoover may be the most honest and most honorable man that ever trod this mundane sphere, but as an American citizen, Mr. Speaker, I am not in favor of clothing any man, whether or not he be sent to us by England, with unlimited autocratic powers and placing in his hands $150,000,000 of the people's money—to use as he pleases—and the destiny of the 45,000,000 producers in this country. That Mr. Hoover is a most wise man I am ready to admit, for he tells us so himself, and I take it that he speaks knowingly. In fact, he is a little ahead of Solomon, for Solomon, though a man of exceeding human wisdom, did not, as I understand it, perform miracles, while Mr. Hoover does. At least, that is the conclusion I draw from some of the literature sent to the newspapers by the publicity department of his administration, a sample of which I will here give:

PUBLICITY DEPARTMENT, FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
FOOD CONSERVATION SECTION,
Washington, D. C., July 14, 1917.

To the EDITOR:

Herewith I am inclosing to you some material that has been sent out from the Food Conservation Section of the Food Administration to the news associations and by them sent over their wires. I feel that there are stories in this material that you have not seen and that these may be of use to you.

Your name is on the mailing list of the Food Conservation Section, and after this news stories will be mailed to you Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays.

I hope you will find here something useful to your paper and to the great cause of food saving.

Faithfully, yours. KATHERINE LECKIE.

Among this "material" sent to the different papers throughout the country, we have this item which is of special interest, as it refers to Mr. Hoover himself and shows the exalted opinion the gentleman has of Mr. Herbert Hoover. The item bears date of July 13, 1917, and reads as follows:

[For release July 13, 1917.]

FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
FOOD CONSERVATION SECTION.

Post-office clerks rubbed their eyes to-day when they found in an incoming mail sack a letter bearing no other address than "Mr. Miracle-Man Hoover, Washington." On a guess as for whom it was intended the letter was carried to Herbert Hoover, United States Food Administrator. The guess proved correct. The writer tells of the pressing need for food conservation, and adds "God bless you in your service to our country."

A distinguished Member of the United States Senate, in discussing this highly interesting news item on the floor of the Senate a few days ago, expressed himself as follows:

This statement is being sent out by Mr. Hoover about himself, in order that he may thereby glorify himself by having it printed in all the papers of the country. It is, I assume, sent out at Government expense.

And no doubt the papers printed it, and which recalls a very interesting item concerning many newspapers published in this country. The item referred to is taken from pages 2947 and 2948 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and is as follows:

Mr. CALLAWAY. Mr. Chairman, under unanimous consent, I insert in the RECORD at this point a statement showing the newspaper combination, which explains their activity in this war matter, just discussed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE]:

"In March, 1915, the J. P. Morgan interests, the steel, shipbuilding, and powder interests, and their subsidiary organizations, got together 12 men high up in the newspaper world and employed them to select the most influential newspapers in the United States and sufficient number of them to control generally the policy of the daily press of the United States.

"These 12 men worked the problem out by selecting 179 newspapers, and then began, by an elimination process, to retain only those necessary for the purpose of controlling the general policy of the daily press throughout the country. They found it was only necessary to purchase the control of 25 of the greatest papers. The 25 papers were agreed upon; emissaries were sent to purchase the policy, national and international, of these papers; an agreement was reached; the policy of the papers was bought, to be paid for by the month; an editor was furnished for each paper to properly supervise and edit information regarding the questions of preparedness, militarism, financial policies, and other things of national and international nature considered vital to the interests of the purchasers.

"This contract is in existence at the present time, and it accounts for the news columns of the daily press of the country being filled with all sorts of preparedness arguments and misrepresentations as to the present condition of the United States Army and Navy and the possibility and probability of the United States being attacked by foreign foes.

"This policy also included the suppression of everything in opposition to the wishes of the interests served. The effectiveness of this scheme has been conclusively demonstrated by the character of stuff carried in the daily press throughout the country since March, 1915. They have resorted to anything necessary to commercialize public sentiment and sandbag the National Congress into making extravagant and wasteful appropriations for the Army and Navy under the false pretense that it was necessary. Their stock argument is that it is 'patriotism.' They are playing on every prejudice and passion of the American people."

From the manner in which the papers are eternally advertising, without charge, the game of Mr. Herbert C. Hoover, of Red House, Hornton Street, London, England, and publishing daily boosts of the "Miracle man," written in his own office, they—the newspapers—are evidently doing their best to stand squarely by the contract of the 25 papers alluded to in the item extended to the RECORD by Mr. Callaway and quoted above.

Mr. Speaker, shortly before the food bill was drawn in the Department of Agriculture to be introduced in the House, and while certain newspapers were busy preparing the way for the creation of a food dictator, the Secretary of Agriculture, in order to offset this claim of the newspapers, published an article in a food journal, from which the following excerpts are taken:

There is nothing in the food situation of the country which justifies hysterical thinking or action.

The department and all agricultural agencies of the country are giving definite and careful attention to these problems. The Federal Government, through several of its departments, is giving continuous consideration to the immediate problems presented and to the possibility of remedial legislation.

The solution will certainly not involve a Federal dictatorship, and it is highly unlikely that it will involve a dictatorship in any State or community.

America does not take kindly to dictators. The difficulties, in any event, would be very nearly insuperable. We have a continent to deal with, and there are difficulties of double jurisdiction.

Consider, for instance, the matter of fixing a minimum price. The Federal Government could deal only with commodities passing into interstate commerce. The States might be hampered in attempting to fix prices.

Mr. Speaker, we are maintaining a Department of Agriculture at an expense of millions of dollars annually. The department has an army of paid experts, men who have made a study of and understand every phase of farm conditions, and yet who are now brushed aside while a mining expert is brought over from England to take over the destinies of the farmers of this country and put on their produce a price that will no doubt be agreeable to the country where he makes his home and where his business interests are maintained. Well may we pause and ask ourselves, "Whither are we drifting?" And we also have cause for deep reflection when we recall that the Senate a few days ago voted down an amendment authorizing the President to appoint only bona fide American citizens when he named the commission to control the farm produce of the United States. Mr. Speaker, when we can not trust our own citizens in matters of such vast importance to themselves and to their country, then surely are we drifting on dangerous shoals and rocks. If we have men, Mr. Speaker, who violate our laws by forming combinations in restraint of trade—such men as are classed as middlemen—then we have laws sufficient to check them, and the matter of their prosecution should be left with the Department of Justice and not with the food administration.

Mr. Speaker, there is another feature of this bill to which I wish to call special attention. It is that feature which has been injected into it by an element known as the Anti-Saloon League. It is to the Anti-Saloon League that I wish to pay my respects, and I shall tell some things of this organization that are evidently not known to some of my fellow Congressmen, who, it seems, stand in awe of this unholy alliance of men who are "uplifters" for the money they may get out of their "uplift" work. Mr. Speaker, I do not know how I can better describe the Anti-Saloon League than to quote from Clean Commonwealth, a prohibition paper published in Butler, Pa., and which evidently speaks by the card. That paper says:

For cold effrontery, brazen pretense, impertinence, blasphemy, and colossal humbuggery the Anti-Saloon League leads anything of the last hundred years. Look at the facts and see:

It is a colossal pretender. Why? Because it has heralded itself in assembly and paper and pulpit as a "federation of the churches," when no federation existed or had ever been formed.

It has practiced outrageous fraud. How? By exhibiting false and lying maps in the pulpits everywhere, which represent that great victories have been won, that the country is rapidly growing dry, when the volume of drink traffic is all the time increasing.

The Anti-Saloon League is an unmitigated liar. Why? It has everywhere represented itself as the stepping-stone method, while it can't take a single step until it first carries the State and gets control of the legislature.

It is an unspeakable fraud. Why? Because it has collected millions of dollars of sacred money from the churches under pretense of securing or enforcing law and has squandered it among a lot of hypocritical grafters.

The strange and disgraceful feature of this gigantic fraud is that it is operated by preachers. The star-route frauds were worked by a coterie of politicians, the Credit Mobilier was a coterie of detestable thieves, but the Anti-Saloon League is composed of preachers robbing the church.

But Clean Commonwealth does not state it all. The Anti-Saloon League does not work its grafting scheme through the churches alone, but it also gets money from big corporations; and it has even been charged, and I believe with justice, that certain mail-order whisky houses have in the past been heavy contributors to its game, in return for which the league was expected to close saloons in counties or States into which whisky could be shipped from the outside. A near-by State is a notable instance, and it is openly charged that an Anti-Saloon League worker, who stands high in the league's councils, was responsible for this State's quart law. The harvest reaped by certain mail-order whisky houses, especially one in Washington, has simply been enormous. And it is a rule, unwritten it may be, but a rule, nevertheless, of mail-order whisky houses to reward those who best serve them; and how can you better serve a mail-order whisky house than to create a market for its merchandise?

Mr. Speaker, the Anti-Saloon League is no federation, as its name would imply, but instead it is a close corporation and practically under the control of one individual, who has grown immensely rich from his enterprise. It maintains national headquarters at Westerville, Ohio, and all State leagues are only branches of this Ohio corporation and to which the State leagues (or "department," as they are termed) must pay a certain percentage of all the money they collect. A few years ago in Texas a legislative investigating committee had before it the superintendent of the Texas Anti-Saloon League. That State superintendent was Dr. J. H. Gambrell, still a resident of Texas, and that he may not be misrepresented I will quote from his testimony taken before the legislative investigating committee and duly recorded in the journal of the House of Representatives of the Texas Legislature. The testimony follows:

Dr. J. H. Gambrell, called for examination before the committee on examination by Mr. Bagby, testified as follows:

Q. Dr. Gambrell, where do you reside?—A. Dallas.

Q. Are you connected with a political party organization for political purposes?—A. I am connected with——

Q. In what official way?—A. I am superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League, which is an interdenominational organization.

Q. What?—A. An interdenominational organization.

Q. As an organization, did it take any active interest in the campaign which has just ended?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What do you mean by the expression interdenominational, Doctor?—A. I mean that it is a combination for the antisaloon sentiment of all denominations.

Q. Religious denominations?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. By what authority do you act, how are you organized, and how are your officers elected?—A. I was not in the organization of the league in this State; the organization is made up of representatives of various denominations and such others as are in sympathy with the purposes of the organization.

* * * * * * *

Q. Has it [the league] any connection with any antisaloon league that is a corporation?—A. No.

Q. Does it send delegates?—A. We have what we call a conference, you understand.

Q. Where do these conferences assemble? Are they held—where do the conferences assemble?—A. Well, at different places; I don't remember just where, because I wasn't connected with the league at the time; they are held in different States, but they are made up of the representatives of the different leagues who care to come together for the conference.

Q. Do you know whether any of those organizations are incorporated or not?—A. I understand, though—that is, I won't state this of my knowledge.

Q. I understand that.—A. I understand the Ohio league is incorporated for the reason that that is the organization that furnishes the supplies for most of the leagues in the State. I go further and say——

Q. The State of Ohio?—A. Yes, sir; and say we do not get our supplies from the Ohio league, except just when we can get them there on better terms than we can elsewhere. The States are, also, as I understand it, absolutely free to get their supplies wherever they please; they can get them there if they want to; we have ours printed in this State.

Q. Is there a national organization?—A. Yes, sir—well, no; I don't know that you can say that; there is a national superintendent and there is a national assistant superintendent.

Q. Who are they, Doctor?—A. Dr. P. A. Baker is the national superintendent.

Q. Where?—A. Westerville, Ohio.

Q. Who is the assistant?—A. Rev. E. W. Young; I think his postoffice address is Louisville, Ky.

Q. Doctor, how are you elected as superintendent of that organization?—A. I was elected by what is known as the headquarters committee.

Q. Composed of whom?—A. Let's see if I can——

Q. I mean composed of what men? I don't care about their names. I mean the manner of their selection.—A. Well, composed of representatives of the various denominations.

Q. In the State of Texas?—A. Yes, sir.

[Dr. Gambrell then explained that the office force at Dallas during the Texas prohibition campaign of 1911 was composed of four people, viz. the State superintendent, two stenographers, and a bookkeeper. "Occasionally somebody was called on just for emergency, but that was the regular office force during the campaign." The doctor again explained that the State was divided into nine districts, and each district had a district superintendent. The following is a list of the district superintendents as given by Dr. Gambrell, the State superintendent: Dr. G. A. Faris, Dallas district; Rev. G. W. Eichelberger, Fort Worth district; Rev. R. C. Dial, Abilene district; Rev. J. H. Thorn, Nacogdoches district; Rev. W. M. Shelton (of Grayson County), San Antonio district; Rev. Atticus Webb, Brownwood district; Rev. W. C. Dunn, Houston district; Rev. P. H. Faulk, Waco district. Only eight names are given here.]

Resuming the examination:

Q. Now, is that your field force—that is, what you designate as your field force—or are they just superintendents?—A. Yes, sir; these men, these district superintendents, sometimes have men to help them. That has always been done by agreement.

[Later on in the record the names of H. F. Sutton, E. G. Shouse, W. W. Nunn, and H. A. Ivey are given as helpers and who received commissions.]

Q. What salary do you receive, Doctor, as superintendent of the association?—A. Three thousand dollars.

Q. What does each superintendent of the field force receive?—A. They are employed on a commission basis and pay the force according to the work they do.

Q. What commission do they receive?—A. Fifty per cent.

Q. Of what amount?—A Fifty per cent of the amount collected.

Q. What from—from what sources do they collect this money—what manner?—A. Wherever they speak we have a card system, a pledge-card system, whereby pledges are taken for 12 months, payable quarterly, in any amount that the subscriber wishes to give, any amount from 10 cents up; these cards are all passed in, and all cash passed in by the field men to the headquarters; all these pledges are entered on the books, cash all entered, of course; quarterly statements are sent these parties making these pledges, and, whatever is paid on these pledges, the field men get 50 per cent of it; they pay their own expenses.

Q. What becomes of the other 50 per cent?—A. It is used in the office in maintaining the office force.

Q. This 50 per cent that the field men receive of the collections is 50 per cent of the amount pledged by these cards for the year as it is paid in?—A. As it is paid in?

Q. Yes, sir. This 50 per cent which comes into your office, as reported by the field superintendent, does it remain in your office as a part of the funds to be expended in the State of Texas, or is any portion of it sent out of the State?—A. It is; there is 2½ per cent of the funds that goes to the support of the national superintendent.

* * * * * * *

Q. Do you know of your own knowledge what salary is received by the national superintendent of the national association?—A. No, sir; I do not.

[It will be noted in a previous portion of his examination Dr. Gambrell stated that the Texas league had no connection with antisaloon leagues of other States or with any antisaloon league that is a corporation. The superintendent of the Ohio concern, which is a corporation (the State leagues being only branches of the Ohio concern), and P. A. Baker, one of its original five organizers, is the national superintendent to whom the Texas league, according to Dr. Gambrell, sends 2½ per cent of all money collected. Baker was a very poor man—a preacher receiving a salary of $100 a month—when he organized the antisaloon league, and he is now reputed to be one of the wealthiest men in his section of Ohio.]

Q. This 2½ per cent paid by you to the national association, was that the 2½ per cent of the entire amount collected by you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Was it 2½ per cent after the 50 per cent commission had been deducted to be paid to the different field superintendents?—A. It is 2½ per cent of the entire amount.

* * * * * * *

Q. Then your method of conducting this campaign (referring to the prohibition campaign of 1911) was to distribute literature by mail?—A. And through the chairman.

Q. And through the chairman?—A. And through the preachers and general discussion.

Q. And through the preachers and general discussion! Of this amount collected, more than half was paid, wasn't it, to those——A. I don't remember the figures exactly.

Q. Well, it figures $16,000; 50 per cent that was collected, necessarily by your contract, was to be paid to the field agents?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Or field superintendents?—A. Fifty per cent of it.

Q. Fifty per cent of it; and 2½ per cent was to be sent to the National Anti-Saloon League?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. So that was 52½ per cent of the amount collected that must be necessarily paid out for conducting this work?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Out of your office?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Then, if these eight men engaged in that work from the 1st of January to the 22d day of July, approximately seven months, they received for that seven months' service approximately $800 apiece?—A. Well, that is just a matter of figures; I haven't figured it out, but they didn't receive—that would not be accurate, an accurate statement, for the reason that some of them received a good deal more than others.

Q. Yes, sir; I see Mr. Dunn has received a good deal more than anybody else. Did these field superintendents have any authority to appoint assistants to do this work, assistants to themselves, who were conducting the same character of work throughout their particular districts?—A. Only in their own fields and by agreement; they could not do it independent of approval, and it was never done except when it was thought it was necessary in order to cover definite territory.

Mr. Speaker, I think this testimony of a former superintendent of the Texas Anti-Saloon League—a branch of the Ohio corporation—is all that is necessary to convict the league of being a very crooked concern. The men, chiefly so-called preachers, who made the collections, were allowed to disgrace the pulpits with their presence, and being skilled in their work they excited their hearers by painting horrible pictures of the saloons, and then appealed to those thus excited to give freely of their money that these saloons, these "sink holes of iniquity," might be closed. They didn't once tell their congregations that they, the collectors, were to receive 50 per cent of all money thus collected, and that the remainder, saving 2½ per cent, which went to the parent league of Ohio, was to be paid out in high-priced salaries and that a very small per cent of the money collected, less than 10 per cent, went to the cause of prohibition, and this in the way of a little literature that was disseminated, as a general thing, through the Anti-Saloon League workers. Statements furnished by Dr. Gambrell to the legislative investigation committee showed that two of the league's workers in Texas, the Rev. W. C. Dunn and the Rev. G. W. Eichelberger, received as their share of the spoils in a period of six months, respectively, $1,701.82 and $1,330.18.

This money, as a general thing, was collected from pulpits, and the people who gave it did so under the belief that they were contributing to help close the saloons and not to help swell the purses of men who were using the cause of prohibition to feather their own nests.

In one part of his testimony before the legislative investigation committee Dr. Gambrell stated that he was elected State superintendent "by what is known as the headquarters committee, composed of representatives of the various denominations" in the State of Texas, and that his organization had no connection with any antisaloon league that is a corporation. However, not a very great while after this statement was made the Rev. P. A. Baker, of Ohio, the controlling spirit of the Anti-Saloon League that is a corporation, and to which Dr. Gambrell's league paid a certain per cent of all the money it collected, visited Texas, had some kind of a meeting called at Waco, put Dr. Gambrell out, and "elected" in his stead the Rev. Arthur J. Barton, who seemed to "chime in" better with the Rev. Baker's policies. The Rev. Barton has since been given additional duties as one of the Anti-Saloon League lobbyists at Washington, and if there ever was an impudent lobby at Washington it is this Anti-Saloon League lobby, headed by Rev. Mr. Dinwiddie. As an instance of its impudence, I will quote an editorial from the Cincinnati Enquirer of July 10, 1917, and which reads as follows:

THE LIMIT.

For brazen effrontery, unmitigated gall, superlative egoism, transcendant audacity, supreme impudence, commend us to the legislative committee of the prohibition lobby that has throttled war legislation and has delayed the Nation's preparation for the great conflict in which it is engaged. The story is told with such charming sang-froid by the official organ of the antiliquor lobby that we leave it to that publication to relate:

"On last Thursday, June 28, the legislative committee of the Anti-Saloon League of America, which was in session with the national executive committee of the league in Washington, was summoned to the office of United States Senator MARTIN, of Virginia, the Democratic floor leader of the Senate. On arrival at his office we were informed that the President had just sent a messenger to him to ascertain, in view of a prolonged threatened filibuster by the representatives of the liquor interests in the Senate, if we would not consent to strike from the food administration legislation, now pending in the Senate, beer and wine, as he was very anxious that this legislation should speedily be enacted. The appeal was made in the name of patriotism. We asked if the appeal had been made to the other side, and were informed that it was no use, as Senators like PENROSE, of Pennsylvania, and his type declared they would filibuster all summer before it should pass unless beer and wine were exempt. Knowing as we did that that traffic always puts personal gain over patriotism, we informed the Senator that if the President would put his request in writing, thus assuming the responsibility, we would give the matter careful consideration."

There you have it, and that's all there is to it. The President of the United States is under orders from this officious and offensive lobby. Mr. Wilson must give written bond for his own conduct and for that of the industry the lobby is seeking to destroy. This, perhaps, is the first instance in the history of the Republic wherein the simple word of the Chief Executive was not of sufficient force and character to stand by itself. For unadulterated effrontery, even mendacity, this lobby's act deserves a niche in history.

Mr. Speaker, I have in my possession the names of 19 men who were workers for the Michigan Anti-Saloon League not a very great while ago. Their records as Anti-Saloon League workers are taken from the church and court records of Michigan, and they are shown to be as tough a lot as ever inflicted any community with their presence. Of the 19 whose names I have, 17 of them are known as preachers, and the crimes for which they were either "run in" or "run out" are listed as follows: Misappropriation of Anti-Saloon League money, licentious conduct, adultery, perjury in a divorce case, unprovoked assault on a small boy, theft, drunkenness, bigamy, seduction, assaulting a negro girl, blackmail, undue intimacy with women of a church congregation, and swindling.

Of these, 4 were sent to prison, 6 were expelled from the church, 3 fled the State to escape arrest, 3 were convicted of misdemeanor and paid their fines, and the remainder managed to wear their cases out. As far as I know, these men are still known as Anti-Saloon League workers, for they understand their business and are good "money getters," where they are not known, and to be a good "money getter" is one thing that always recommends a man to the Anti-Saloon League.

Mr. Speaker, it is this class of "uplifters" that is busy telling the people what to do, and their impudence is simply superb and knows no bounds. They have succeeded, however, in making the politicians believe that they possess great political power, and that is why the Anti-Saloon League lobby is permitted to insult Congress with its impudence and insolence. If Congressmen would treat these lobbyists as they deserve to be treated, we would, in the future, hear but little of this bunch of religious grafters, who boast that they not only influence Congressmen, but those even in higher official life.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr JONES].

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, we have heard a great deal in this discussion about the conservation of our present supply of food and the encouragement of additional production. Much abuse has been heaped, with pervid eloquence and vitriolic fire, upon the head of the middleman and speculator who have been pictured as fiends incarnate, wholly lacking in patriotism and absolutely devoid of honor. No doubt they merit much that has been said about them, but the elimination of the abuses in connection with their activities will not furnish a complete remedy for the present situation. The trouble is a more fundamental one, is of an economic nature, and has been brought about by a condition that has prevailed in this country through a period of years. The reason for the high cost of living and the shortage of food production has been brought about largely by the fact that for many years young men have been lured from the country to the city because of better opportunities and what appeared to be larger fields of activity. The trend has been away from the open country, away from the farm, and away from the fields of production to the crowded cities and thickly settled districts. Thirty years ago about 65 per cent of our people lived in the country and only about 35 per cent lived in the city. This ratio has gradually changed until now nearly 60 per cent of our people live in the cities. This has been caused by the fact that in the country the hours of work have been long, the character of the work has been burdensome, and the prices have been so low it has been impossible for the farmer to receive the just rewards of his labor.

In the district that I have the honor to represent there are 20,000,000 acres of land that have never been touched by a plow and that are just as virgin as when Columbus first set foot upon American soil. More than 18,000,000 acres of this land are rich and fertile and only need the intelligence and industry of man to make them productive. The only way to cause this land to be cultivated, to cause it to become productive, and cause it to be settled up is for the tillage of the soil to be made attractive by virtue of higher prices and greater opportunities. My father has lived on a farm all of his life, and during my youth I have lived upon the old farm, when prices were so low that only by the most rigid economy could a living be had.

Now, for the first time in the history of this great Government, the farmer is coming into his own, and prices of farm products are such as to make farm life attractive, and I glory in the fact that the farmer is finally getting a reward for his labors. I hesitate to support any measure that might interfere with his present prosperity, and I shall only support this measure after voting to strike out certain features which I regard as objectionable as war legislation, and because of the fact that the Commander in Chief claims it is necessary for the proper conduct of this war. But even as war legislation I think it should be properly safeguarded and the interests of the farm carefully protected.

In my judgment the interests of the farmer and this country would be best subserved by letting the farmer alone. If you let him have a real price for his products and conditions are such as to make his returns attractive, he will produce all the food and food products that are necessary to feed both ourselves and our allies. If there is danger of food shortage, it is well for us to remember that people eat less and waste less when food is high than when it is low in price; that people will use and waste less wheat when it is $2 per bushel than when it is $1 per bushel; and that at the same time there will be a greater effort and a greater resultant production when wheat is $2 than when it is $1 per bushel.

A great deal of wheat is grown in the district that I have the honor to represent in Congress. I would not fear if the farmer were let alone and his wheat prices were left untouched by law, as I think the world-wide demand would insure him a liberal price for that necessity. However, in view of the fact that the President has seen fit to place an embargo upon wheat and in view of the fact that this embargo may be made more stringent at any time by adding to the countries upon which the ban is placed; and in view of the fact that the President and Congress have determined that we are to have a food bill; and in view of the fact that it is determined on the part of those in authority that there shall be a minimum price, it is highly important that that minimum price should be placed high enough to really stimulate production.

The food administrator declared in his testimony before the Senate that the power which the administration is asking would enable him by control of the foreign sales to reduce wheat to the price of 75 cents per bushel. Of course he disavows the intention of so reducing it; but I am unwilling to place in the hands of any one person, whether that person be English or American, the right to reduce the price of so necessary an article below the cost of production. In view, therefore, of the powers that are being conveyed, I think a minimum price of $2 per bushel should be placed upon wheat, and I think it should be so stipulated in this bill. The testimony before the committee shows that with wheat at $2 per bushel, flour can be sold at $9.20 per barrel, which is much lower than it is being sold at the present time.

Many things are being done during this emergency that do not entirely meet with the approval of my judgment. For instance, I have not thought, nor do I now think, it wise to send our armies to European soil. When the original resolution was up and it was voted to recognize the existence of a state of war, I supported the amendment which would have confined our activities to the defense of our country and to warfare upon the high seas. In the legislation with reference to the increase of the Military Establishment and the raising of an army, I voted for the amendment which would have forbidden this country to send any soldiers, whether of the Regular or the selected Army, to foreign soil unless they specifically volunteered for the foreign service. As our rights had been violated upon the high seas, and as the freedom of the seas is all important in view of the fact that the commerce of the world is carried on on that great highway, and as the prices of our products would be reduced to a pitiless minimum if we lost the freedom of the high seas, it was my judgment that our warfare should have been confined to that activity. But other and perhaps wiser counsels prevailed. The administration has decreed that our armies shall be sent to Europe. An overwhelming majority of the Members of Congress support this attitude, and I willingly submit to their judgment. I voted to authorize the raising of an army—as it takes a long time to train a real army—and since, in an hour like this, when the world appears to be insane, no one can tell when an army will be needed for defensive purposes.

There is no doubt that the Kaiser dreamed of a world-wide conquest just as much as did Napoleon or Alexander. Therefore preparation both with reference to an army and navy was absolutely necessary. This policy, however, has now been settled and this country, from Lakes to Gulf, and from sea to sea, should unite in a common purpose.

Now, in my judgment, our allies need munitions and food supplies more than they need men, and our primary activities should be exercised in the promotion of food production, the building of ships, and the carrying of those food products to the markets of the world. However, the policy of this country having already been established, and our country having entered the war fully and finally with a declared policy of fighting the same to her utmost limit, I shall vote for every measure that it seems would hasten an early and successful termination of this inhuman strife. The one purpose of this country should be to achieve a victory and to mold that victory into a just and permanent peace.

A great many of the men who have spoken here seem to have had the idea that we should absolutely control the prices of food products and reduce the high cost of living by law. In other words, a great many of those who have the consumers' viewpoint seem to think that the mad rush of the last few years to the cities, and the absurd conditions that have been brought about by reason of that fact, can be remedied by limitations of law. This is like trying to amend the laws of nature. In carrying out our purposes in this war we should not lose sight of our own economic conditions, and prices should be high enough to encourage men to move not from the country to the city but from the city to the country, and thus to get our population properly apportioned.

I realize that the gambler and food speculator have been guilty of abuses, and I have voted and am still willing to vote to give the President power to force the sale of foods that have been hoarded and where it has been sought to secure a corner on any article of food. But some people seem to have gone wild on the proposition of food control. One Member has introduced a bill to prohibit the sale for slaughter of any "heifer under 6 years of age." This is another effort by some one to regulate the details of a business he does not know anything about. You might as well say you could not kill a chicken until it reaches 3 years of age or a rooster until his spurs were a certain length. However, I shall have more to say about that bill if it is ever reported by a committee. I merely mention it to show the absurd lengths to which men will go when excitement prevails.

Another feature that I think deserves more than passing attention is the proposal to regulate the prices of machinery, farm implements, and tools which are necessary and essential to the production of our food crops. The American farmer is patriotic; he has always been willing to make sacrifices for his country. He has fought for the rights of this country on every field of battle since its organization, but it is unfair and unjust to expect him to do more than offer his share of the sacrifice.

If he is producing an article that is absolutely essential to the welfare of this Nation and to the winning of the war in which we are engaged, it seems highly important that those who are selling him products should come under the same rule and submit to the same regulation to which the producer is asked to submit. It is true that the prices of farm products are high at the present time, but everything that the farmer uses is also high, and prices of everything that are being sold both in and out of this country have gone to unheard of limits. The prices of farm products should be high. I am anxious to see the time come when the young men of this country who live in the cities will plan to go to the country for greater opportunities than can be found in the crowded cities.

Another matter I consider of far more importance than the present food bill is the establishment in this country of a thorough marketing system to the end that the producer and consumer may be brought in closer touch with each other, that there may be greater publicity of prices that the consumer pays and that the producer receives, and that those prices may be more nearly uniform and much nearer the same. In many instances the products of the farm are wasted because there is no apparent market, when at the same time in other sections of the country there may be a very great demand for that particular article or product. It would be folly to destroy our present system of distribution without at the same time providing a new and better one. By the establishment of a system of licensed and bonded selling agents the country over, together with a thoroughgoing publicity system which would make known the local demands and supplies in various sections of our country, a better market may be had for the products of this land and at the same time a more reasonable price had for the consumer. The food bill is a temporary matter. The establishment of a great marketing system should be a permanent one. Nothing would do more to promote the prosperity of our land than the assurance to producers that they would have the advantage of ready markets, and an assurance to the consumers that they would be able to receive those products at the price paid the producer plus only a reasonable profit for distribution. This system would reach the heart of our economic troubles and do much toward prosperity all over the Nation.

The tiller of the soil is the most important citizen in this country and has always been. He is the foundation and groundwork of this country's surpassing prosperity. On his primary efforts rests the magnificent commercial superstructure that has been reared in our land. If he fails, all is lost. "When tillage begins, the other arts follow. The farmer therefore is the founder of human civilization." He must feed the world in this crisis. How foolish it would be to hamper his efforts, to discourage his industry, or to diminish the rewards of his labor. How shortsighted would be a policy that would shackle his progress for a temporary advantage to the consumer when that advantage would mean an ultimate and far greater loss both to the producer and to the consumer. Our hopes, our aspirations, our future as a nation are dependent upon the efforts and permanent prosperity of the producer. This great country, cradled in liberty and founded in honor, must walk by his side in prosperity as in adversity. How wise that government and how wise its policy which zealously guards the liberties of all its citizens and neglects the rights of none; no prouder boast could any nation have, no surer guaranty of success.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. LOBECK].

Mr. LOBECK. Mr. Speaker, when the pending bill was before the House on June 23 I voted for it because the state of the Nation required, and it requires now and will continue to require during the period of the war, the most extraordinary stimulation in the production of the necessaries of life, together with an immediate and adequate conservation, a quickened distribution, and a rigid safeguarding of them against gamblers, speculators, and price fixers.

This measure embodies so many wholesome and necessary reforms demanded by the people in all sections of the country that it is to be regretted that it could not have been put into operation weeks ago, because, while the agitation of the question by both Houses of Congress has prepared the country for it, deserving penalties are not being meted out to those who are doing the things which will be unlawful for them to do when this legislation is finally enacted into law.

The country was thoroughly aroused before and during the crop-planting season by a wholesome propaganda in favor of increasing the acreage and yield of food products in general. The country responded promptly, and now that the harvests are being harvested let us hasten the enactment of this legislation in order to do the all-important thing of conserving the already increased supply of food and food commodities.

Briefly the bill provides for Government control of foods, feeds, and fuels, for a food administrator, for drastic penalties against hoarding and speculation, for a licensing system giving the President power over dealers, for presidential authority to close exchanges and boards of trade, for presidential authority to control the buying and selling prices of food products and fertilizers for the production of farm products, for a guarantee of $2 a bushel as a minimum price for wheat, for prohibition against the use of foodstuffs in the making of whisky, and appropriates the sum of $152,000,000 to enforce its provisions.

In my State, though the wheat yield is 50,000,000 bushels less than last year, due to the winter wheat failing because of climatic conditions, nevertheless it is estimated that nearly 20,000,000 bushels (although late reported results from thrashing give hope for larger increase) will be produced, and a rigid conservation will have to be exercised. All other crops are increased, the potato crop being twice as large as last year. It is estimated that the corn crop will amount to 240,000,000 bushels, as compared with 185,000,000 bushels produced in 1916, and that there will be an oats crop of 93,000,000 bushels, against 30,000,000 bushels produced a year ago. The barley crop will be 6,000,000, while last year it was less than 3,000,000; and the rye crop is 4,500,000 bushels, as compared with the yield of 4,000,000 last season. With these total estimates before us, Nebraska will produce a grand total of 21,500,000 bushels of food producing cereals in excess of last year's yield. Here is proof of Nebraska's response to the Nation's call for greater production, and she will respond to the purposes of this bill and help conserve these commodities and prevent gambling and speculating in them.

Yes; Nebraska has produced, and will conserve. When war was declared she came forward with her full quota of recruits for the Army and the Navy. She oversubscribed the liberty-loan bonds and her quota to the Red Cross. In the operation of the selective-draft law not a single disorder was reported, and to-day the youths of the State are obeying the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy by coming forward for service as their names are called, because they have faith in the President and in his purposes in carrying on the war.

Some think the Executive is being given too much power under this bill. That might be, but Congress makes the laws and the President executes them, and this being a war measure, it properly comes under his jurisdiction to enforce it as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and we can rest assured that he will put its provisions into active operation. It is assumed he will appoint a food commissioner to assist him, just as we have a collector of customs and a commissioner of revenue to carry out the provisions of the tariff and revenue laws. If the President in his judgment selects a gentleman much discussed now, Herbert Hoover, he will have the energy, experience, and executive ability of a man who has made a success of everything undertaken so far, and who has already, without the title of food commissioner, made a very profound and wholesome impression on the people of the Nation, and holds forth a flattering promise of making good in this proposed important work. His motto is, and it should become the motto of the Nation at large, "Eat plenty, wisely, without waste."

In all legislation pertaining to the war, we have placed our confidence in the President, properly and necessarily so. In the last Congress I voted to give him authority to arm our merchant ships and for the national defense act. I voted for the declaration of war which gave him full and absolute authority to conduct the war against Germany to a successful conclusion, for the military bill which authorized the President to raise and equip a select army, for the bond issue which was to help finance the war, for the revenue bill which is to raise additional funds, for the aviation bill, for the amendment to the Federal reserve banking law, for the food-survey bill, and for the law to give the soldiers that are fighting the battles more pay, and for all other measures looking to a successful prosecution of the war. I will continue to support the President and his advisers in this great emergency, because the people of the United States have trusted him in the past and will continue to do so, having the greatest confidence in his discretion, ability, and patriotism in upholding the dignity and honor of our beloved country.

This is no time for debate or argument; the time is for concerted and united action, that this terrible war that has come to us may be ended quickly and brought to a successful termination and glorious victory.

"A song for our banner," the watchwords recall
Which gave the Republic her station—
United we stand, divided we fall!
It made and preserves us a Nation.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON].

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my congratulations to the chairman and to the members of the Committee on Agriculture that this bill is now soon to be enacted into law. This legislation will, in my judgment, accomplish a great deal of good for the country. At the present time and for many months even prior to the entrance of the United States into the war widespread, unconscionably greedy profiteering in food products and fuel has been going on in the country. It has long been patent to every intelligent and honest citizen that some drastic action by the Government must be taken to prevent, in so far it may be humanly possible, further extortions during this war by gamblers and speculators in food and fuel supplies. A wise and vigorous administration of the provisions of this measure will, in my opinion, be highly beneficial to not only the consumers of food products and fuel, but to the producers and honest distributors of food products and fuel as well. I think I now realize how fully the success or failure of this legislation will depend upon the manner in which the powers granted to it by the President are administered. Personally I am gratified that the responsibility of the administration of this legislation is to be placed in the hands of one man. While I do not overlook in any way the tremendous powers granted by this legislation, I do firmly believe that under existing circumstances better results for all our people will be derived through its administration by one man rather than by a commission of several men. [Applause.] In the administration of this legislation it will be most unwise if the fullest and fairest consideration is not given to the producers of food products. The farmers of this country should and must be allowed as much for their hours of labor and for their capital invested in the production of food supplies as is allowed to other laborers in the most necessary manufacturing industries of the country for their hours of labor and for their capital invested. The farmers of this country want no more than this, and they should be asked to accept no less.

A great economic error will be made and a grave wrong will be done our people engaged in agricultural pursuits if an intelligent and well-concerted effort is not made under the provisions of this measure to have paid to the farmers of the country for their products prices that will give them for their hours of labor and for their capital invested at least as much as they would receive for their labor and capital in any manufacturing or distributing business. This is the best way to make farm life more inviting and attractive, and it is the fairest and most certain way of increasing the production of food products. As I have said in the House before, this legislation is not at all as broad as it should be to meet the problems which now confront our people in this country. To my mind there is every reason now why the President should be given the power to conserve the supply and control the distribution of all articles of clothing and all manufactured products. Until this power is given to the President or some executive authority, and until it is used with a most firm hand, manufacturers and retail dealers will continue to extort from the people, as they are now doing, exorbitant prices and profits.

I regret that the House did not have a fair opportunity to vote upon the Senate amendment for a joint committee on expenditures in the conduct of the war. I am certain that if the House had been given any opportunity to vote directly upon this amendment the vote would not have been 101 for it to 160 against it, as suggested by my good and genial friend from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER]. Nor do I for a moment think that my good friend from South Carolina seriously thinks this provision would have been overwhelmingly defeated in the House if it had been brought to a separate vote. However, that is water that has already gone over the dam. My sincere hope is that this legislation which we are now about to enact will be fairly and wisely administered.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. KINKAID].

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, I shall not hesitate to vote for the adoption of the conference report. This does not mean that the provisions of the bill, including the amendments of the Senate adopted by the conferees, are entirely satisfactory to me. My vote for the report will mean that, as it is up to me to vote for or against it at this parliamentary stage when no change can be made, I choose the alternative of voting for it.

Mr. Speaker, let it be borne in mind that I am also contemplating that the law is one thing and its administration another. How the law will operate necessarily must depend entirely on how it is applied. Vast authority is conferred by the bill, intended to be so administered as to promote the general welfare without doing injustice to individuals. Great care and wisdom will be required to secure its successful administration, while, if mistaken policies be pursued, wrong and injustice must result.

But as it is for the Congress to do its part by conferring the authority asked by the administration, then it will be for the executive branch to promote the greatest good possible by its salutary application.

Mr. Speaker, my chief purpose in saying anything at this time is to go on record against the war-council amendment, which I am glad to know the conferees have eliminated, but which several of the Members yet contend should have been preserved as part of the act. Fundamentally, I am decidedly opposed to the principle of the proposition to divide up the authority and responsibility of the administration of the law and the exercise of the war power in such manner, and, in this instance, especially opposed since the President has said that the providing of such a committee would mark a lack of confidence and put him under "daily espionage." I believe in strongly centralized power for war purposes to the end that prompt decision and efficiency may be secured. This centralized power is what makes Germany efficient in the war, while the lack of it is what renders military conditions in Russia deplorable.

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote without cavil and ungrudgingly for the authority conferred by the act, preferring to avoid rather than to find differences with the administration as to matters pertaining to the prosecution of the war. I deem it paramount that in the recognition of the unity of the Nation on the issues of the war all partisanship, all politics, shall be forgotten, since whatever appears to reveal division of sentiment gives encouragement to the enemy and feeds the mad hope of the final subjugation of the world.

I keep in mind that legislating the law by Congress is one thing and its administration by the executive branch of the Government is another. We can do our part by conferring upon the President such supreme power and such vast responsibilities as have never been expressly granted to any of his predecessors, and in doing this we shall act with an abiding faith in his high purpose and his resolute will to conserve the welfare of the Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I shall of course support the report made by the conference committee, but as a matter of precaution against future conditions which I feel sure will arise, I wish to say that I do not approve of the effort to fix a minimum price of a product by law. I regret very much that the situation was such as that the conferees of the House felt constrained to agree to the Senate amendment, which fixed $2 as a minimum price for wheat. This is said without any criticism of the conferees on the part of the House, for I understand the situation; but that is a proposition which once written into law under stress of a great emergency is going to rise to plague this Congress and this country again and again and again in the years that are to come. The demand will be here when no emergency exists such as now exists. I do not know whether I will be here when that demand comes or not, but as a matter of precaution I felt that I wanted to express my convictions upon the proposition at this time. I do not think it will have any good effect in increasing production of food products generally. It may, as the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] said a few moments ago, cause an abnormal increase in the production of wheat, but a corresponding reduction in the production of corn, oats, and other food products. I believe it to be an unwise proposition and I regret exceedingly that we have to agree to it.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman think that the minimum price fixed in the bill will, in effect, amount to the maximum price?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not think so at all. I think that wheat will be worth more than $2 a bushel. The only possible way in which it can affect the maximum price will be by creating such a production of wheat as that it will bring it down to that point.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, a convention was recently held in Washington where the coal men of the United States agreed that the price of coal should not exceed a certain amount. My recollection is $3 per ton. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether that was an agreement entered into voluntarily or under pressure used upon the people representing those operating the coal mines?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will say to the gentleman that I have no information about that subject beyond what I read in the press. I read with a great deal of interest what the newspapers said concerning it. I do not know, but the impression that I got was that it was a voluntary proposition.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR].

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for this bill with a great deal of pleasure, and I believe it will result in much good to the country. My prediction is that unless we do something quickly in respect to the enactment of the food-control bill, instead of flour being fifteen, sixteen, or seventeen dollars a barrel, it will soon be twenty-five to thirty dollars a barrel.

As indicating the serious condition confronting the country because of the scarcity of last year's crop of wheat and the difficulty in securing new wheat, I shall read to the House a communication from a miller in Scranton who is unable to secure wheat, and a letter from Mr. Herbert Hoover, to whom I presented the predicament of my constituent:

SCRANTON, PA., July 24, 1917.

Hon. JOHN R. FARR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Community Mills were started the first of the year, and we have experienced little or no trouble in getting wheat until the last three or four weeks. Most of the wheat was brought from the West, but the last few weeks the western houses have refused to quote, and the Philadelphia concerns have always refused to quote, claiming there was no wheat to be had. As all our wheat is shipped with draft attached (all of which has been taken care of promptly), we conclude there must be a reason for the apparent reluctance to sell.

As this is the only flour mill in Lackawanna County, we thought perhaps you would be glad to put us in touch with some one having wheat to sell. We would like a car of good spring and a car of good winter wheat. This is a mill of 50-barrel capacity for 24 hours.

Do you think the Government will take the flour mills over?

Any information will be greatly appreciated.

Yours, sincerely,

COMMUNITY MILLS,
GEO. A. SUTHERLAND.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 26, 1917.

Hon. JOHN R. FARR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. FARR: Referring to your letter of the 25th and the letter from the Community millers in your district of July 24, which I return herewith, as you probably are aware the amount of old wheat carried over in this country from the last crop to the new one has been reduced to a minimum. The new crop which should have relieved this situation ere this is, in the eastern section, delayed by rains and in the western is being held by the grower to an extent never before known. Besides that the old grain marketing machinery, which for 30 years served its purpose excellently, has broken down under war strain and gone, and dealers in grain no longer dare to buy from the farmer nor sell to mills as they used to do, nor will this be restored until Congress grants some authority for a steadying influence.

I have no disposition nor intention to take over or operate the flour mills of this country under any authority which Congress may give. I do not think it is necessary. I do think it absolutely necessary that authority be given me so that I may extend the steadying hand to every facility between producer and consumer, and if this is not done and done shortly the condition your correspondent speaks of will be duplicated in every community in the United States and chaos will rule. I can not make my conviction of this too strong.

Yours, truly,

HERBERT HOOVER.

This correspondence forcefully presents the necessity for this legislation and immediate determination of it to prevent a chaotic condition and a much higher range of prices for foodstuffs.

Following the outbreak of the European war, three years ago, I foresaw the danger to our country in the advanced cost of living that would follow the tremendous drain on our food resources made by the warring nations, and I then introduced a bill to ascertain the amount of the wheat supply, wheat flour, and the products of wheat, and to authorize the President to issue an embargo on wheat and its products when our needs were endangered. On December 4, 1916, I reintroduced this measure, but without avail. Action then on what we now realize was a most vital question would have been of incalculable benefit to us in the understanding and control of the food question which we now seek and so seriously need.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, before I begin, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to say that I have grave doubts as to the efficiency of this measure. I doubt that it will accomplish any good results. In the presence of the multitudinous agencies that are now in force to regulate everything and everybody in this country I doubt very seriously whether any single individual is big enough to extend himself with any effect over this great Western Hemisphere, or, in fact, over the whole world, which, according to the provisions of this bill, he will have the authority to supervise. However, this authority has been sought by the Chief Executive and by the majority party in power, and, inasmuch as they have sought it and are to assume the responsibility for it, I am willing that it shall be done. But for the fact that I am called away to the hospital on account of the sickness of my daughter I should vote for the conference report, but I shall not be able to be present when it is voted upon. I wish to reassert that I do not believe the bill is going to accomplish anything whatever except confusion and disorder, disappointment, if not disgust, and dismay throughout the land, much as I hope to the contrary.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON].

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, within the limited time yielded me by the chairman of the committee it will be impossible to discuss at any very great length the provisions of the food bill as reported by the conference committee.

At the outset I desire to congratulate the chairman of the House committee, the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], and the members of the conference committee on the bill which they have been able to report. In my judgment it is an improvement in many respects over the bill as it passed the House and as it passed the Senate. Many provisions were added in the Senate which improved the bill, and some were added which detracted from it. I am glad to note that the bill contains at least some provisions which I proposed in the Committee on Agriculture and again in the House, and which were there rejected.

It will be remembered that in both the committee and the House I proposed an amendment which prohibited persons accepting employment from the Government, either voluntarily or at a salary, from entering into contracts with themselves; in other words, prohibited them or companies or corporations with which they were connected from furnishing the Government with any supplies whatever. This provision was voted down in the committee and in the House, but was accepted by the Senate and by the conferees and is now a part of the bill. This is a good provision; and while those who accepted employment from the Government might not have taken advantage of the employment in order to enrich themselves or the companies or corporations with which they were associated or with which they were interested, it is a good thing to make it absolutely impossible for them to do so if they were so disposed, and the bill as it reads does that very thing. The bill as it comes back to the House from the conference does not authorize the commandeering of food products or feed in the hands of the original producer. This is in accordance with an amendment which I offered in the committee and again on the floor of the House. It was added in the Senate and is a most splendid provision. It takes care of the farmer and prohibits taking from him involuntarily the result of his labor and toil. It is in accordance with the views of the President and of Mr. Hoover, and it never was intended that such a condition should be possible, though the original bill made it possible. In this respect, also, the bill is a very great improvement over the measure as it passed the House.

Mr. Speaker, it is very safe for gentlemen to criticize a bill and at the same time announce that they are going to vote for it. It is always the part of political wisdom to vote against practically everything that comes up, because it is very seldom that any proposition that is advanced works out exactly as those who propose it say it will work out, and the man, therefore, who opposes it is always safe in opposing it.

My friend from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] said that he regretted very much that the minimum price for wheat had been fixed in this bill. I have a statement here in my hand, furnished me by a distinguished citizen of my State, Senator Marvin, of Woodward, made by a cooperating milling company at Woodward, Okla., the city of my colleague [Mr. MORGAN], which gives the price paid for wheat during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1916, and ending June 30, 1917, and the price charged per barrel for flour, the product of this wheat. Sixty pounds of wheat makes a bushel, and 4½ bushels of wheat make a barrel of flour—196 pounds. The bran and the shorts are supposed to pay the entire expense between the farmer and the ultimate consumer. Four and one-half bushels of wheat at $2 per bushel would make the price of a barrel of flour $9. All millers will tell you that the bran and shorts pay all the legitimate expense of handling the wheat, milling it, and handling the flour between the farmer and the ultimate consumer.

The statement which I have discloses the following facts:

Now, in July, 1916, this mill paid 95 cents a bushel for wheat and sold flour at $5 a barrel, 196 pounds to the barrel. In August they paid $1.26 a bushel for wheat and sold flour at $5.40 a barrel. In September they paid $1.47 per bushel for wheat and sold flour at $7.20 per barrel. In October they paid $1.52 a bushel for wheat and sold flour at $6.80 per barrel. In November they paid $1.78 per bushel and sold flour at $8.80 per barrel. In December they paid $1.65 per bushel for wheat and sold flour at $8.80 per barrel. In January they paid $1.85 a bushel for wheat and sold flour at $8.80 a barrel. In February they paid $1.75 a bushel for wheat and sold flour at $8.80 per barrel. In March they paid $1.85 a bushel for wheat and sold flour at $9.20 a barrel. In April they paid $2.45 a bushel for wheat and sold flour at $12 per barrel. In May they paid $3 a bushel for wheat and sold flour at $13 a barrel. In June they paid $2.60 a bushel for wheat and sold flour at $11.80 a barrel. Now, the average during the year was 1.84\frac{5}{12}$ per bushel for wheat, and they sold the flour at $8.80 per barrel. The average cost of 4½ bushels of wheat, insurance, and so forth, was $8.87. Now, the insurance was $1,820 for the entire output per year. This was a mill of 25-barrel capacity, and the interest on the investment was $2,464, and the interest and insurance per barrel was 57⅛ cents.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this $2 minimum price provided by the conferees in this bill is less than $10 per barrel for flour, and the consumers of the country at this time are paying $17.50 per barrel for flour. This bill is intended—these conferees, the people who wrote this bill—intended that the President of the United States and the food conservator should take out this slack between the producer and the consumer, take out this $7.50, and if they will do that, Mr. Speaker, everybody in this country will be satisfied. The producer will get a good price for his product and the consumer at the same time will get flour at a reasonable price. [Applause.] And, Mr. Speaker, the conferees ought to be congratulated upon securing an agreement upon this item, because one of the great objects of the bill is to encourage an increase in the production, and you can only do this by making it profitable to the man who is in the business of production.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING].

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, while I do not indorse in their entirety the provisions of the conference report on this bill, I shall nevertheless vote to adopt it, because I have no desire to see this bill delayed any longer, and because I realize that differences between the two Houses of Congress have to be adjusted in the light of the situation existing in each House.

I desire to congratulate the House conferees on two propositions. One is that they eliminated the provision for a board of three men to administer this law instead of one, and the other is the elimination of the provision for the appointment of a congressional committee to nose around through the departments to see if they could find some fault with the executive branch of the Government. If that provision had remained in the bill, the recent row in the Shipping Board would have been a Sunday-school frolic compared with the performances of such a congressional committee. From every standpoint it was an unwise and unnecessary provision, and its elimination is to be commended.

In so far as the conference report falls short of the House provision with respect to the use of foods or foodstuffs in the manufacture of vinous or malt liquors, I regret the failure of the House conferees to induce the Senate conferees to agree entirely to the House provision. But it is a great thing to be able to stop the manufacture of distilled liquor in this country, and the provision as to beer and wine is better than it was as adopted by the Senate. The Senate ignored these beverages entirely, while the conference report authorizes the President to stop or restrict their manufacture, if necessary, for the conservation of food, or if by so doing the national security and defense would be subserved. If this war shall last two or three years, as it may, the time will undoubtedly come when we will be compelled to conserve every item of food in the United States.

Those who are interested, directly or indirectly, in the manufacture of these liquors will be compelled to undergo the same sacrifices others are now asked to undergo. Not only is this true, but all fair-minded men must agree that it would greatly enhance the national defense and security to save not only the foods now wasted in the manufacture of these liquors, but also the vast sums annually expended for these beverages which should be diverted into channels more worthy and more productive. We should put aside every unnecessary indulgence or luxury that may in any way contribute to shorten our supply of food or weaken our national defense.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Therefore I am glad that instead of agreeing to the Senate amendment ignoring these beverages and leaving them entirely out of any sort of control under the bill the conference report restores them to the bill by authorizing the President to prohibit their manufacture in order to insure an adequate supply of food, and I trust the wisdom of exercising this authority will be made immediately to appear. I yield to the gentleman from New York for a question.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman says he would put aside every luxury. Does that apply to tobacco?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from New York does not mean to convey the impression that he thinks tobacco is used as food.

Mr. PLATT. But the gentleman referred to luxuries. He said he would put aside every luxury.

Mr. BARKLEY. I said every luxury or indulgence that interfered with an ample supply of food; and I desire to inform the gentleman that tobacco is not a food. People do not eat it or anything made from it.

Mr. PLATT. But can we not use the tobacco land in the production of food?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will answer the gentleman by saying that if the use of tobacco interfered in any way with a supply of food, those who produce it would be willing to make whatever sacrifice their country might call upon them to make, and would do so more cheerfully than those who are interested in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors which do waste food. And I may say also that those who are producing tobacco are also doing their share toward the production of food for ourselves and those with whom we are cooperating in this war.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I regret that the commandeering section of the bill was not so changed as to include alcohol in any form, whether necessary for redistillation or not. It was my understanding that this section was to be changed so as to give authority and direction to take over not only liquors in bond or in stock for redistillation but for use also, thus authorizing the commandeering of alcohol made for commercial or other legitimate purposes, and preventing the necessity to use foodstuffs in the manufacture of alcohol for any purpose until the available supply had been appropriated. I regret that the situation seems to have prevented the House conferees from insisting on strengthening this provision, but I trust the authority granted may be construed to be broad enough to include the taking of all alcohol wherever found, either for governmental use or for preventing the destruction of foods in its manufacture.

In view of the certain adoption of this report, and in view of the long delay in the passage of this bill, a delay for which no one in this House is responsible in any degree, I trust that the results to be obtained from this legislation will justify the hopes of all its advocates and hasten a successful conclusion of the war. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, no one realizes more than I do the tremendous task that the conferees have had to perform in bringing in this conference report. It is a report that brings the bill back to a condition nearer to that in which it left the House than we had reason to anticipate. I want to congratulate the managers of the conference on the part of the House for the splendid work that they have done in framing this conference report.

I have been very much interested in the question of fuel supply for the wage earners and the people of the cities, the small householders. I suggested to the conference committee that if provision were made for the regulation of coal, provision ought also to be made for the regulation of natural gas and fuel oil, and I am glad to see that in the rewritten first section of the conference report provision is made so that the bill includes fuel oil and natural gas. It seems to me that if the coal situation is regulated all the other fuel that comes into competition with coal ought also to be regulated, and that it would be the part of wisdom if that was done. But I notice that in the section referring to the control of prices of articles of fuel the price control is limited to coal and coke. There is no provision for the regulation of prices specifically as to the other great fuels of the country—natural gas and fuel oil. In my judgment it might have been the part of wisdom to include them. However, we can not expect in this conference report that all that every Member has suggested or would agree to should be included, but it seems to me when we come to the actual operation of this act we will find it necessary to regulate the price of fuel oil and natural gas in competition with coal and coke.

Now, I understand that in including natural gas and fuel oil in the term "necessaries" it prevents the hoarding, the manipulation, the speculation in and restraining of commerce of these commodities—natural gas and fuel oil—and it thereby gives the food conservator a large measure of control over these matters of fuel.

I want to say that the fuel situation is acute all over the West to-day. It is especially acute in the Southwest. Not only will the supply of coal be taxed to its utmost this coming winter on account of the shortage of transportation facilities, but everything that can supplant coal and which can be used to relieve the shortage of coal and the shortage of transportation must be resorted to. People who can not obtain coal must obtain natural gas and fuel oil to take the place of coal, and I should think it would be the part of wisdom if we could regulate equally the price of each. But we have a provision here now for regulating the manipulation and control and sale and distribution of fuel oil and natural gas as one of the necessities in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I have been of opinion, and still am of opinion, that the subject of food control is so large that it will require a special administrator, and will be found too large for the food administrator to undertake in conjunction with the important duties of food control; but in the present condition of affairs it may be that a subcommissioner can take care of the situation. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I am entirely in favor of the conference report, and have but this one regret, that it does not contain the Senate provision to establish a committee on expenditures on the conduct of the war.

I rose primarily for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question, if he will give me his attention—a question on that subject. As a preliminary, may I congratulate the gentleman also on his extremely able handling of this measure and other measures of which he has had charge? The gentleman from South Carolina is sometimes accustomed to say that he has not a deep knowledge of parliamentary law, but I think I can truthfully say that there is no more effective parliamentarian on the floor of this House than he. [Applause.]

Now, of course, I do not know the proceedings indulged in during the conference, but, following the newspapers, it seemed that this committee proposition was the last which was agreed on, and in fact for some time the conference was in a deadlock about it. But when the deadlock was broken it was announced in a number of newspapers that it was by reason of an agreement which was reached that both in the House and in the Senate an opportunity would be given to vote upon this proposition separately. I would like to ask the gentleman from South Carolina if such an agreement is in sight?

Mr. LEVER. I am glad the gentleman asked the question, because it gives me an opportunity to say what I should say, on the part of the House conferees that there was no such agreement entered into by the conferees on the part of the House. On the contrary, the conferees disclaimed any power over the Senate Committee on Rules or over the Senate, to handle that situation, and we had no promise to make to the House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That was so far as the House conferees were concerned?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; that is so.

Mr. LONGWORTH. But it seems in fact an agreement was reached as to the conferees of the Senate, because the Committee on Rules only yesterday reported the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to congratulate the House conferees on the splendid work they have accomplished, and in particular I wish to congratulate them for having stricken out of the bill the provision for the "snooping" committee. [Applause.]

I remember, and I want to call the attention of my colleagues on the Republican side of the House to the fact, that when the Democrats obtained control of the House in the Sixty-second Congress they appointed about a dozen of these "snooping" committees. They cost the country many thousands of dollars, paid out in attorneys' fees, witness' fees, and the Lord knows what. And what did they accomplish? Not a God blessed thing. That is just exactly what would be accomplished by a "snooping" committee at this time.

I believe it is the duty of Congress during this emergency to present a solid front to the country. I believe in standing by the President of the United States in this emergency. [Applause.] He is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. He will have to give an account of his stewardship in proper time to the people of the United States. Let us not hamper him, and we will be doing a service to our country. We will let the common enemy know that the American people, represented by the Congress of the United States, intend to stand by the President in order that he may bring this war to a speedy and successful conclusion. [Applause.]

There are a number of features of the bill that I should like to discuss. I have not the time to do it, but I have no misgivings as to the benefits this bill will bring to the people of the United States. I feel confident that it will result in a reduction of the price of articles of food to the consumers of this country. They are clamoring for relief. This bill has been delayed too long. I am glad, indeed, that the conferees have brought the bill in here for our vote to-day. I again wish to congratulate the chairman of the committee and his colleagues for the splendid work they have done. They deserve the thanks of the House, and I as one member of the minority desire to extend my thanks. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I wish in my time to offer a motion to recommit.

The conferees have made three important and far-reaching changes in the so-called Pomerene or coal-price-fixing amendment. Bad as it was, they have made it worse. The membership of this House are aware that under the Pomerene amendment the President of the United States is authorized to fix the price of coal and to prescribe such rules and regulations as he sees fit under which the mines shall be operated. This House is further aware that if the coal operators of the country fail to operate their coal mines at the prices fixed by the President, in the way and manner in which the President believes they ought to be operated, in that event he is given the power to take over the coal mines of the country and operate them on Government account.

The Pomerene amendment further provided that in the event the President should take over the coal mines of the country and operate them, he shall have the power, while operating or causing to be operated any such plant or business, to prescribe such regulations as he may deem essential for the employment, control, and compensation of the employees necessary to conduct the same.

The Pomerene amendment as it passed the Senate further provided that if the wages fixed by the President were not satisfactory to the miners of the country, in that event they should have the authority to appeal their cases to the board of mediation and conciliation for relief. In my speech on this floor the other day I did not attack this bill on the ground that the miners themselves had been discriminated against except I called attention to the fact that unless the operators were paid a fair price for their coal it would be impossible for them to pay the miners a reasonable wage for their labor; that you could not damage the one without injuring the other, and other than that I believed that the interests of the laboring man had been fairly well guarded; but the conferees have so changed this bill as to deprive the miners of any right of appeal to any board or court against the most flagrant violation of their rights. In other words, they will be compelled to accept without question, whatever wage the President may fix. It is proposed here to give the President the power to make the miners work at a fair or an unfair wage, as he sees fit. On behalf of the miners, I protest against such arbitrary power over their wages, their destinies, and their lives.

The conferees have made another serious and far-reaching change in the Pomerene amendment. Bad as it was, it was not all bad. As it passed the Senate this provision was contained in it:

> There shall be but one such dealer between the producer and consumer or user.

In other words, as this bill passed the Senate, it cut out the middlemen who must bear their full share of responsibility for the high price of coal. I thoroughly indorsed the cutting out of those middlemen. I indorsed that part of the Pomerene amendment. It cut all of them out but one. But when the conferees got through with it, and as we are called upon to vote upon it, that provision of the bill, as I say, was cut out, and there may be one, ten, or a million middlemen between the producer and the ultimate consumer so far as this bill is concerned. What will it profit the Government, what will it profit the consuming public to fix a price of coal at the mouth of the mines, and then give every dealer who cares to touch it even a reasonable profit for getting his finger in the pie?

This bill is unjust to the operators; it is unfair to the miners. The coal operators are called upon to make a sacrifice of their business, while the United States Steel Corporation, for example, goes on rolling up its millions without let or hindrance on the part of the Government or this administration.

The New York Times of yesterday said:

> The aggregate net income of the United States Steel Corporation before depreciation allowances were made was $144,498,076 in the three months ended June 30, 1917, a total greater than the result of every full year in the corporation's history except three.

The coal operators are asked to cut down the price of coal to the United States Steel Corporation so it can still make its millions. The steel corporation has not been asked to make any sacrifice for the coal operators, the Government, or anybody else, and it still continues to sell its steel rails to the coal operators and others for $100 per ton when $24 is the normal price.

The coal miners are asked to take for their wages whatever price the President may choose to fix for them, while the employees of the steel mills, iron foundries, munition plants, and so forth, are at liberty to make money hand over fist.

It is not fair. It is not right. Millions of men and women fondly believe that this food bill will perform a miracle in the reduction of prices, especially on necessaries. They will be sadly disappointed. I do not believe that prices will be cut down much, if at all, to the individual consumer. They are likely to increase; but President Wilson says that if we will pass this bill it will greatly aid him in the prosecution of the war and that it will cause prices to come tumbling down. We all want to see prices come tumbling down. Many believe that we ought to give the administration whatever it asks and hold it to a strict accountability. While I did all I could to prevent it, nevertheless, "hit or miss, win or lose, for better or for worse, President Wilson is the Nation's leader; all, for the time being, we have to look to and rely upon," but thank God it will not always be thus. [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I regret very much to see that my good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] has undertaken to play politics at a time like this. There ought not to be any politics played. All gentlemen ought to do everything in their power, regardless of political affiliations, to aid and to back the President in this time of war. This is a war measure, and I regret that there is anyone in this House who would undertake to delay or defeat this legislation. Gentlemen, the people back home are getting weary of the way one branch of Congress is tying up legislation, and I think we ought to make it clear and plain that this branch is not responsible, but that another body is respousible for the delay, for the dragging out all summer and holding back these important war measures.

The other day one Member in another body by his objections held up for 10 days the aeroplane bill, a very important war measure. Would Germany have asked anything more? Another one praised the slackers and the traitors of Canada for resisting the selective draft. Would the Kaiser have asked more? Another has tried to discredit Mr. Hoover before the country. Yes; they have belittled him and besmirched him as much as they could. Would the Kaiser have asked more? And on yesterday one introduced a bill to have a referendum as to whether or not the Commander in Chief should send men out upon the ocean or beyond to fight for the honor and the liberty of this country. Would the Kaiser have had him change his tactics? And in this House a Member from Illinois [Mr. MASON] introduced a bill, which is now pending, asking that the selective-draft law be repealed, and the German spy system is urging that petitions be sent to Members to vote to repeal the law—the law under which we are forming an army to defend the life of this Nation from the dangers that threaten it.

Shades of Abraham Lincoln, the martyred President, whose memory we all love and honor. [Applause.] I call upon the State of Illinois to repudiate this action of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON]. The remains of Lincoln sleep in the soil of that State. My God, how restless he must be in his grave when a man from Illinois introduces a bill that would prevent the raising of an army to defend the Nation in this time of war! [Applause.] Another gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] introduced a bill to exempt all men who had German blood in their veins from the provisions of the selective-draft law. What would that do? Why, the Kaiser would say to Germany: "The people of the United States are not with the President; the people of German blood in the United States will not fight against Germany." The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] has a bill which would present that situation. The other Member from Illinois [Mr. MASON] desires to undo the selective draft and leave us without an army, and a Senator from Georgia has introduced a bill to get every man's consent as to whether he will go abroad and fight for the country. On my responsibility as a southerner and as an American citizen, loyal to that flag, I repudiate the action of every southern Member who is not loyal to the country and to the President in this war. [Applause.]

It is true that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON] in his position here does not speak the views of the people of that State, and it is true that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] does not speak the views of the people of German blood in Illinois. His bill is a reflection upon all of them. There are a few anarchists and a few traitors. Emma Goldman has been arrested and Berkman has been arrested. If I were President, I would point out some others who belong in the class with them.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the gentleman give me two minutes more?

Mr. LEVER. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 12 minutes.

Mr. LEVER. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, what is the subject under consideration?

The SPEAKER. The conference report on the food bill.

Mr. HEFLIN. Judging from that question, you are under consideration. [Laughter.] Sam Jones used to say that it is the hit dog that hollers. If I am weaving a cap that fits the gentleman, he must wear it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Was the gentleman from Alabama given two additional minutes?

The SPEAKER. He was.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. The gentleman from Alabama is aware that the two gentlemen from Illinois, Mr. MASON and Mr. BRITTEN, are not in the Chamber.

Mr. HEFLIN. I looked for them, but did not see them. Does the gentleman think that their presence would have anything to do with me in making the statement? I will tell the gentleman where I think these two gentlemen are.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I think it would have a great deal to do with the gentleman from Alabama in what he has done heretofore.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the gentleman thinks that, then a part of my remarks apply to him.

[At this point Mr. HEFLIN used words that were subsequently ordered to be expunged from the RECORD.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the words used by the gentleman are not parliamentary, and I ask that the words be taken down.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not want my time taken up——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman has been using the names of Members in the first person, which is contrary to the rules.

The SPEAKER. Of course that is contrary to the rules.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Is it in order, then, to make a motion to have stricken from the RECORD that portion of the gentleman's remarks which were contrary to the rule?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that that is such a small matter——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. But it affects the character of Members of this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that perfectly well. The rule is that one Member must not address another or refer to him by his name, except where it is as, for instance, "the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. BRITTEN," but Members do that so often without thinking about it sufficiently—I have done it thousands of times myself—that it is not held to be unparliamentary except when attention is called to it at the time. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania had raised the point while the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] was doing it, the Chair would have sustained the point of order and admonished the gentleman from Alabama to keep within the rule.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama was linking up the names of two Members of the House with "traitors" and with "anarchists," and he attributed to them——

The SPEAKER. If there are any particular words in that speech which the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants taken down, the Chair will hear him.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I demand those words be taken down whereby the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] links up the names of two Members of the House with "treason," with "anarchists," and with "stirring up opposition to the war."

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I think that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] would consider the source, he would not do that.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the gentleman's words be taken down. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands that my words be taken down in which I coupled, as he said, the names of two Members with those of traitors. I am willing that my words should be taken down, in order that the gentleman might have opportunity to make connection between the parts of my speech, and I am willing that this House shall vote upon my speech, to see where it stands.

The SPEAKER. The rule is that when one Member asks that another's words be taken down the Member complained of shall take his seat.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am willing to do that.

The SPEAKER. Now, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I move——

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman will cease until the Chair can state the case. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will suggest the part of the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama that were out of order, which he wants taken down, the Chair will have them taken down.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I did not make a stenographic report of the gentleman's remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can indicate what part it was.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That part of his remarks wherein he used the names of two Members of the House in connection with "traitors," or with "treason," and with "anarchists," and wherein he charged them with stirring up enmity to the draft law.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania rose I rose and gained the recognition of the Chair, and I made the point that the gentleman from Alabama had used unparliamentary language, and made a request that the words be taken down. I referred particularly to the language used just immediately preceding my request, in which he charged two Representatives of this House, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. MASON, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. BRITTEN, with being out in the country stirring up the country in trying to oppose conscription.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Amounting practically to a crime under the laws of this country. It is that language that I requested the Speaker to have taken down as being unparliamentary. I request a ruling upon the part of the Speaker upon that point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not rule upon it until he knows what he said. The Clerk will report the words.

The Clerk read the words complained of.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, in addition to that, I ask that the words of the gentleman be taken down wherein he referred, contrary to the rules, to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEVER. I was about to inquire if the gentleman's request does not come too late upon that proposition? The gentleman from Alabama had completed his speech and had yielded the floor.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, the gentleman is in error as to that.

The SPEAKER. As to the words which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] asked to be taken down, that request certainly does not come too late, because it was the very last sentence in the speech of the gentleman from Alabama, but as to the other remarks the Chair thinks the request comes too late.

Mr. LEVER. It seems to me so.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the rule is, although nobody seems to pay any attention to it, especially at the other end of the Capitol [laughter], that it is against the rules of both Houses for a Senator in one instance or a Member in the other to refer to a Member of the other body. That is the rule. But the Chair thinks he could stand here and enumerate 20 instances that happened in the last 10 days where that has been violated. The Chair thinks the request comes too late. Now, the question is on these last words which were taken down at the demand of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move that those words be expunged from the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves that those words be expunged from the RECORD.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman demands the yeas and nays. Evidently a sufficient number, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 190, nays 122, answered "present" 17, not voting 103, as follows:

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, did my colleague, Mr. CANTRILL, vote?

The SPEAKER. He did not.

Mr. LANGLEY. I have a general pair with him. I voted "aye." I wish to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. LANGLEY, and he answered "Present."

Mr. RUCKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. RUCKER. On the second roll call I misunderstood the Clerk, and I voted at a time when another Member's name was called.

The SPEAKER. Who was the other Member?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. DRUKKER, as I now believe. I thought it was "RUCKER."

The SPEAKER. If Mr. DRUKKER's name appears on the tally sheet as voting, the Clerk will scratch it out.

Mr. RUCKER. I understand from a gentleman here that he was present.

The SPEAKER. He might not vote the way the gentleman from Missouri voted him.

Mr. RUCKER. I voted him "no," [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. How did the gentleman from New Jersey vote?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Mr. Speaker, Mr. DRUKKER was present and voted "aye."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The words are expunged from the RECORD. [Applause.] The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] has 17 minutes, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] 10 minutes.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, now that the storm is passed and the weather is clear outside and inside, I want, in my five minutes, to begin by saying I congratulate the House Committee on Agriculture and the conferees of the House. This bill as now reported is an improvement, in my judgment, upon the House bill and upon the Senate bill.

"Many men of many minds." We have a Constitution in the United States. Under that Constitution all the guaranties are given under normal conditions for the protection of life and property. Under the war power in the Constitution we have the power to enact legislation that would not stand for a holy minute under normal conditions.

I recollect very well that during the Civil War there was legislation that was denounced by one-third of the people north of Mason and Dixon's line as unconstitutional, and as the epithets that were put upon the President of the United States, Mr. Lincoln, what is spoken now amongst ourselves, about anybody in Congress or in official life, is like a gentle summer evening zephyr as compared with a whirlwind. [Laughter.]

So much for that. It is behind us. There has been much of criticism, and I have no doubt from the standpoint of gentlemen, honest criticism, concerning the provision in this bill creating a joint committee of the House and Senate, which was stricken out. From my present viewpoint I believe it was fortunate that the House had its way.

The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] has already called attention to the fact that there are 10 committees of this House on expenditures in the various departments, a majority of whom are Democrats and a minority Republican. We have 10 committees that can investigate. It is said that they are not investigating. Would another committee on investigation simply because it is joint improve upon the 10 committees? I apprehend not.

Much has been said about the committee on the conduct of the war during the Civil War. After all is said and done, my recollection is—and my reading confirms me in that recollection—that that committee did no service that was valuable politically or that was valuable otherwise in that great contest. The time has passed when we can stop and consider why we are in this war or how we might have avoided it. Right or wrong, wise or unwise, we are in it, and so far I believe there is no way to get out except by cooperation with our allies whether we like them or not in all particulars. [Applause.]

Gentlemen talk about the price of wheat. Some gentlemen object to the minimum price that was fixed. That price applies only to the crop of 1918. Now, in my judgment, the price of wheat will be higher than $1.75 a bushel, as the minimum price, when you take on the average the soft wheat as well as the hard wheat—the hard wheat, the spring wheat, being at the maximum—because it is now patent that we have got a short crop, and under the law of supply and demand, if you choose, so far as it can operate, I believe the price will be higher than $1.75 on the average.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that I may briefly extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that he may extend his remarks very briefly. [Laughter.] Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. I merely want to add that in my opinion under existing war conditions we must first feed ourselves, second our allies. Therefore, I indorse the proclamation issued by the President, which is authorized by law, laying an embargo on the export of wheat and other articles to neutral nations that we can not spare or that would reach Germany, with which nation we are at war.

This being the situation, and especially wheat as to its price is not subject to the economic law of supply and demand; it is, in my judgment, proper to fix a minimum price for that product, with the guaranty of the Government.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. OSBORNE].

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, I was in New York one day last week, and, passing down Riverside Drive, I noticed in the Hudson River, at anchor, a fleet of about 50 ships—a fleet of ships of neutral nations—with their names and the flags of their various countries marked conspicuously on their sides. Many of them were marked "Rotterdam," "Amsterdam," and other European cities. In looking at that fleet I could not fail to be convinced that here was an illustration of the manner in which Germany is being fed. No one can look at that fleet as it lies there in the river to-day, withheld from sailing by the rigid enforcement by our Government of the recently enacted embargo law, without the conviction that Germany during the past three years has been largely fed by the United States through the neutral seaboard nations bordering on Germany. The graphic illustration which I have mentioned was most illuminating to my mind, and I wish that a moving picture might be made and exhibited throughout the country of that great fleet of neutral ships all loaded to the guards with grain and other food supplies ostensibly for their respective neutral countries, but which for a considerable part soon would have passed the boundaries of these countries into Germany, or an equivalent quantity of food of native production, to feed the armies with which we are now at war. This fleet also gave a strong hint as to one of the reasons of the high price of foodstuffs now prevailing—the demand of Germany for our products, through Holland and other neutral countries, for which Germany is willing to pay any price, however exorbitant.

The embargo law, which has enabled our Government to stop this method of feeding the armies of the enemy, is one of the drastic laws necessitated by the war, and which was bitterly opposed upon the floor of Congress because of the great power that it conferred upon the administration.

Such a law as the embargo law would be abhorrent to our free American system of commerce in time of peace. In time of war, however, and in conditions that have prevailed since the 6th of April it constitutes a weapon of national strength second to none other, and it would have been worse than a great mistake to have withheld it from the Commander in Chief and his advisers.

The control-of-food bill, the conference report upon which the House now has under consideration, is even more sweeping and drastic than the embargo act. It enters upon fields of governmental control of the most radical nature, heretofore unexplored in the history of the United States. As a law in time of peace it would be utterly at variance with American policy and without merit. In a state of war, however, everything is changed. As war lends itself on the battlefield to all manner of terrible crime and violations of the moral law that exists between individuals who happen to be citizens of different nations, so it also lends itself to all manner of exploitation and money-making by unscrupulous and voracious men devoid of patriotism, who deal in food and other supplies necessary to the conduct of war and the sustenance of the people.

On the battlefield drumhead courts-martial may summarily punish the vandals who violate the rough rules of war. It is essential to have some arbitrary authority to deal with these vandals who prey upon our people and our armies by forcing the prices of food and the necessaries of life to exorbitant and impossible prices for their own profit.

That war power—and it is essentially a war power and confined to the period of war—is conferred by Congress in this bill. It is an enormous power, and its exercise will frequently interfere with the interests of individuals—interests that would be inviolate in time of peace, but which must give way to the interests and welfare of the Nation in time of war.

War speculation and the undefined fears of deprivation by the people of food and fuel are the instruments that raise the prices to impossible heights.

Let war, therefore, be the warrant for the exercise of the strong arm to stimulate production, conserve consumption, and control speculation in the necessities of life, so that the great majority of us, who are not rich, may neither hunger nor live in fear of hunger and cold.

These powers are intended to be conferred by this bill, and I believe that in a large measure they are so conferred.

The two Houses of Congress, in their care over the enactment of so extraordinary and unprecedented a measure as this, have devoted weeks to its discussion and consideration. While Congress ought not to act on great questions inadvisedly or hurriedly, I would have been glad to have had the measure acted on upon its merits, and without the attachment of extraneous subjects, which were not necessarily a part of this bill, and which necessitated the loss of valuable time. They could better have been treated in separate bills, or attached to other bills in which the element of time was of less importance.

The proposed congressional committee on the expenditures of the war is one that I favor, but I do not think it essential as a part of this bill. I would not interfere with the President in the conduct of the war in the slightest degree through a congressional committee or otherwise. On the contrary, I recognize the enormous importance of centralized power in war, and on this floor I stand firmly for giving the President and Commander in Chief every possible essential authority, and I believe that Congress and the people have to-day conferred upon him the greatest degree of power, actual and potential, that is now exercised by any man on earth. I further believe that this power is worthily bestowed and is being patriotically, carefully, and conscientiously exercised—the very opposite of that which has been exercised by the crowned autocrats of Europe, who have used their power to plunge the world into the most bloody and terrible war of all recorded time.

I respectfully disagree with the President, however, in his misgivings in regard to this committee. In its objects and character it is unlike the Committee on the Conduct of the War appointed during the Civil War, and which, while of great service to President Lincoln in many ways, undoubtedly at times caused that great and patient man some anxiety. That committee dealt with the conduct of the war, and inquired into the management and strategy of campaigns, as well as into the financial affairs of the Nation, while the joint committee on expenditures in the conduct of this war, provided in the Senate amendment to this bill, but which is stricken out in this conference report, is confined to the single subject of expenditures and to advising with the President and the heads of the various executive departments, commissions, and boards in relation thereto. That such a committee, six-tenths of which would be members of the President's political party and four-tenths members of the minority party, would prove a hindrance to the efficient action of the Executive is to me inconceivable.

On the other hand, I can see a distinct advantage in a closer personal relation and a better understanding between Congress and the President than now exists in such a committee. Without intending criticism, and in the way of suggestion only, I would state my impression with deference and as a new and inexperienced Member of Congress that it would be to the advantage of cooperative legislation and effective teamwork in this great war in which we are so earnestly and vitally interested if the President were to call in the leading Senators and Representatives in Congress a little more frequently than is the custom and inform them, confidentially or otherwise, as to war conditions and as to prospective plans in connection therewith. I feel sure that much time would be saved if such agreeable personal intercourse with representative Members on the Republican side of the House were even more common than it is at present. I can not speak with the same assurance for the Democratic side of the Chamber, which may be and doubtless is kept better informed than the Republican side, but I have an impression that increased confidence might also be extended in that direction with good results.

I am constrained to congratulate the Republican side of the House upon its uniform support as a party of every bill that has come before this body, from the hour that the President addressed the Congress on the 2d day of April until the present moment, intended to fortify the President in his great work of prosecuting the war. The Republican Party in Congress has marched straight to the front on every war measure from the formal declaration on April 5, through the various enormous appropriation bills and bills conferring extraordinary and almost unlimited power, until the present time. On one of the most vital war measures—that providing for the selective draft—the leadership in carrying the bill fell upon my distinguished colleague from California [Mr. KAHN], and was ably and manfully carried out by him, supported by nearly all his Republican colleagues.

While the President has been thus loyally supported by the minority party on this floor, it has been upon their part a pure exercise of patriotism. It might have been easier or more spontaneous had our great President—who has been harassed with so many grave and perplexing questions that slight and unintentional lapses may well be overlooked—occasionally or more frequently followed the example of the beloved McKinley and the immortal Lincoln, and called into consultation some of the leaders of the minority party, and allowed them to become for the moment the sharers of his anxieties. President McKinley's road was made smooth by these considerations to the minority leaders, and his appointment of distinguished Confederate officers, like Gen. Joe Wheeler and Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, to high station, was as popular in his own party as it was in the country at large. Lincoln's great Secretary of War, Edwin M. Stanton, was drafted from among his theretofore most bitter political opponents.

As we are not to have this joint committee on war expenditures in this bill, I venture the respectful opinion that it would prove a great advantage to a more thorough understanding between Congress and the President, and thus expedite necessary legislation, if the President would a little more frequently call in the leaders of the two Houses, the Republicans as well as the Democrats, and take them into his confidence so far as he might deem proper in regard to the war and the needed legislation. It would be well received by the minority and by the country, and would be of substantial moral value.

Whether these suggestions of more cordial cooperation shall be fruitful or otherwise, there will be no diminution in the loyal support of the President upon the part of the minority party or upon that of the great mass of the people of the country. They are loyal to the core, and the longer that the great struggle lasts and the better that it is understood, the stouter will be that support and the more willing will be the great sacrifices that may be made.

It is not easy to become accustomed to a condition of war. Many are asking the question why we are at war, and what will be our conditions of peace. The majority of those who ask these questions are not disloyal, and do not intend thereby to aid the enemy. But the time may come, when the situation and the issues are more fully understood, when all distracting movements from the great struggle to win the war will be regarded and will be in fact less innocent.

The prime object of this war is to abolish all wars in the future. It will not successfully end until that purpose has been accomplished. If all the nations in Europe had been democracies or constitutionally governed monarchies in 1914, this horrible war would never have occurred. It is only the nations that are so autocratically ruled that vast armies can be gathered and controlled by the will of a single man, or a few men, that can plunge great nations into war. Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Russia were the great autocratic Governments that were capable of accomplishing this miracle of horrors in 1914. Russia, as the first mighty result of the war, has passed completely from the ranks of autocracy, and never again will mobilize an army of 5,000,000 or 6,000,000 men in a night. The great Russian people will grope and stumble for a time, but with less pain and suffering than they have endured in the past they will eventually come into their own, with liberty, peace, order, and happiness. It is the task of the great peaceful nations of the world, in the interest of the world's peace in the future, to win this war and place such restraints upon all, and especially upon those nations which through a century of false materialistic philosophy have gone war mad, that its repetition will be impossible.

Mr. Speaker, we of the United States are a peaceful and peace-loving people. We hate and abhor war and entangling alliances with other nations. We would have avoided this war if possible. We maintained our patience and restrained our temper under many bitter affronts. For my own part, rather than engage in the bloody exploits of war, I would have said: "Let us bear still further affronts and injuries. Let us shut our eyes to the murder of our citizens—men, women, and children—on the high seas, rather than engage in war and sacrifice thousands of other lives of the dear sons of our soil." But it was not to be. War was inevitable.

Mr. Speaker, I have heretofore stated on this floor that it is my conviction, borne out by all the evidence, that for more than a year prior to the entry of the United States into the war, on April 6, 1917, Germany was determined to force this country into war sooner or later. In many ways we had angered the German Government and people. While ostensibly treating all belligerent nations alike and opening our markets for supplies and munitions of war to all nations who cared to or could come and get them, in practical operation it worked against the Germans, as they could not avail themselves of our open markets because of the British fleet. We properly took Germany to task for sinking our ships and drowning our people and declared our determined opposition to the operations of German submarines in sinking ships without warning. In all these measures we were fully justified and could not escape making the issue without exercising abject cowardice. Nevertheless all these things angered the German Government, which no doubt had fully determined to call us to rigid account; but they would have preferred to wait until the close of their European war, when Germany could have dealt with the United States single handed. We would then have been without the aid of allies and would, indeed, as the only nation which financially had profited enormously by the war, have been universally despised by the other powers.

At such a time Germany, whether a winner or a loser in Europe, would have found a thousand pretexts for war with the United States—rich, fat, and helpless. We would have been an easy prey, and the billions of indemnity that would have been exacted would in all likelihood have reduced the United States to the position of a vassal nation for a long period—certainly until the indemnity should be fully paid. In the meantime the Monroe doctrine would have been reduced in fact to a "scrap of paper." The Zimmermann note, promising the States of Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona to Mexico, illustrates the materialistic sort of statesmanship that we have to deal with.

This war is a war to prevent and abolish war—which in all time has been the curse of the human race and the cause of its greatest sorrows. We say that it is a war for the democracy of the world. That is true, because it is only through the supremacy of democracy that war can be abolished. Autocracy alone makes great wars possible. Therefore, autocracy, however efficient and wise may its methods be in many ways, is the enemy of mankind, because it fosters war, and conducts war with an almost superhuman effectiveness—all the more effective because it is inhuman and knows no law but that of the most complete terrorism and destruction.

As this powerful autocracy had without question marked the United States for war, with the object of compelling our country to pay the great cost of the European struggle, it was a wise decision of our President to bring the challenge of Germany to the immediate attention of Congress, and it was wise in Congress to at once declare a state of war. We accepted the challenge at once in a manly way, and thereby made friends for our country throughout the world and strong allies of powerful countries.

By abject cringing and backing down, we might have postponed the issue for a few months, or perhaps for a few years; but, like all cowards, we would have forfeited the respect of the world, and other nations, now our allies, would later have witnessed our humiliation and defeat at the hands of Germany—a result which would have been inevitable—without intervention and doubtless with slight sympathy.

It is this one great act of President Wilson—the choice of immediate war even though we were physically unprepared, rather than a paltering policy that would simply have postponed war—that will be marked in history as his loftiest exercise of statesmanship. It was to that exhibition of high statesmanship and strong national policy to which Congress rose with utter disregard to partisanship, and has sustained the President with sweeping and unprecedented powers. For myself, I have voted and shall continue to vote for all these necessary powers with profound satisfaction that I can so serve my country.

The country at large has responded in a thousand ways that bring joy to the hearts of all patriots. Men of affairs—the greatest in the land—have abandoned their private business, and have come here to Washington, without cost of any kind to the Government, and have given months and will give years of their time and their best efforts to systematize and successfully conduct the enormous activities and agencies of the Government, brought into existence by the great emergency.

The most important and impressive thing, however, is that the brave young men of our land have taken their lives in their hands and already have expanded our little Army to nearly 1,000,000 men. In a few months undoubtedly we will have 2,000,000 men under arms, and a great majority of them will be in active service on the battle fields of Europe, fighting for their country, for the democratizing of the world, and fighting to make this the last great war of all time.

Let us all get together—all American citizens, whether native or foreign born—and actively and daily sustain and support our elected leader—the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy—in the gigantic work in which he is engaged. Let us sustain in every conceivable way, day by day, those 1,000,000 or 2,000,000 of our dear sons, who shortly will be enveloped in the uniform of our Army. What are the paltry advantages of partisanship? What is the use of asking whether we could have avoided war or not? What is the use of pestering the administration about terms of peace before war has really commenced, and when no one by any possibility can know anything about the terms of peace? We are in the war, and our all-absorbing business the next year or two will be to fight it out like men.

If we, who are too old to fight, or who are physically unsuited to be soldiers, can do nothing else, let us at least refrain from holding back the President and the Nation, and let us not make it more difficult for the million or two of brave boys who have or are about to go out from us, by asking foolish questions and clamoring about a peace, between which and ourselves lies a bloody and tragic war. Let there be no hanging back. Let everyone do his "bit"—not once only during the war, but once or more times every day. I am touched by the loyal constancy of these good women and girls who daily knit the sweaters and wristlets for the brave boys. It shows that their gentle and tender hearts are all the time in the right place.

Let us who have been honored by seats in Congress at this great hour in our Nation's history fully appreciate our grave duties and heavy responsibilities. Let us as quickly as may be decide upon the laws necessary to the most effective conduct of this war, and enact them with the least possible delay.

Let everyone, whatever may be his station in life, each day do his "bit" for his country, in ways which he or she will recognize. It may be little, but it all tends to the final result. We are all Americans—all brethren. Let us fight out this great war with the utmost determination and self-sacrifice, and with a fixed and unalterable purpose to make it impossible that there shall be left on earth a power that can ever after destroy the peace of the world.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Speaker, I intend to vote for this conference report. I intend to cast no reflection upon the motives of those who have advocated the section in the food-control bill which would have established a joint congressional committee on expenditures, although I feel very strongly that there should be no encroachment by the legislative branch of the Government upon the executive branch. We would resent it if the President were to appoint a committee to supervise or even cooperate in the framing of legislation, and the President has plainly indicated that he considers this section of the food bill implies a lack of confidence in him.

It would be regrettable indeed, and I think the public would resent it, if, after a period of whole-souled cooperation, Congress should now establish a joint committee to supervise the expenditures of the Government. Congress has ample power to regulate expenditures without establishing such a committee. Its function would be mainly inquisitorial. It would have no power to halt expenditures, but it would add to the red tape of administration at a time when the great need is to cut red tape altogether.

Dual control of executive work even now is the subject of public discontent. We have lately seen the whole ship program held up because of such dual control. The late chairman of the Shipping Board insisted that he did not want to hold up Gen. Goethals's program, but in his insistence upon inquiring into every feature of it and talking it over unpardonable delay resulted.

The House, furthermore, rejected the idea of controlling the food situation by a commission of three and instead gave authority to one man. This was in harmony with the idea of getting results. The best thought of the country favors the concentration of authority and responsibility. Upon Congress rests the responsibility for wise legislation to make America's war effective. Upon the President rests the responsibility of making the legislation effective by good administration. With complete responsibility there should be complete authority.

If the House fails to reject this amendment which is objectionable to the President, it will lay itself open to the charge that it is hamstringing the President and his Cabinet in their efforts to win the war. Every day's delay due to discussion and inquiry will be laid at the door of Congress.

I am a Republican, and I believe in the principles of the Republican Party. As a Member of Congress, I believe in legislative freedom from Executive coercion. But, first of all, I am an American, and I stand with the President of the United States. With the Nation at war he no longer can be regarded as the titular leader of the Democratic Party. He is the leader of the American people, the Commander in Chief of the American Army and Navy, and as such he should be left free from any hampering influence.

It has been said that the congressional war committee established to work with President Lincoln caused him great embarrassment. It has been said also that this committee caused him no embarrassment but aided him. Whichever statement may be true, the fact remains that the Civil War lasted longer than it should have lasted, and President Wilson is justified in his belief that the administration can act more speedily and effectively without a congressional committee on expenditures.

Time is the essence of the problem. Victory will not be brought nearer by talking over every move the Nation makes or discussing every dollar that is to be spent. Any information we want we can call for. Any restrictive legislation we want to pass can be passed. For my own part, I believe the patriotic course for the House to pursue is to give full authority and a free hand to the President, responding to his every request for appropriations or laws to make America effective in the war against German autocracy.

The first duty of a good Republican to-day is to be a good American. The great need of the war situation is action. No matter how laudable our motive might be in establishing a committee on expenditures, with power to inquire into the work of the executive departments, the public would construe it as an effort to interfere—to halt and delay prompt American action. Let us put aside partisanship, pettiness, jealousy, and the desire for personal power and glory and put our trust in the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. Let us do nothing which even he can misunderstand or which might be misconstrued by the American public or the German Government as a lack of confidence in the Chief Executive. I will vote against the Senate amendment, in accordance with the President's request in his letter to Chairman LEVER, of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, I favor the enactment of this food bill as a war measure without further delay. So many of its provisions are essential in order to conserve the food supply of the Nation, and, believing and hoping that it will bring cheaper food to the people, I enthusiastically support it, as I have all the measures for the prosecution of this war to a successful conclusion.

The provisions of this bill, however, so far as they apply to bituminous coal, are oppressive, drastic, and wrong. For the purpose of directing attention to these, with the hope that they may never be enforced, I submit a few observations on this part of the bill.

Gentlemen, the pending bill entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," designated as House bill 4961, seems to be especially directed against the coal industry. A number of its sections refer to this important commodity.

The bill as originally passed by the House was intended only in general terms to apply to food, feed, and fuel, without designating practically the manner in which it was to deal with coal, leaving that to the good judgment of the President and the food administrator to be appointed to carry the bill into effect. But the Senate has entirely changed its provisions.

By section 5, which is a new section altogether, the President is authorized to require "any person operating a coal mine producing coal, and any person dealing in coal which enters into interstate or foreign commerce" to take out a license, and provides a penalty of $5,000 for failure to do so.

This is followed by section 6, which prevents hoarding, so that it would be difficult under that section to lay in a winter's supply of coal before obtaining permission to do so, without being charged with hoarding.

Section 8 as amended gives the President power to requisition fuel, and upon compensating the persons from whom it was taken to 75 per cent of the value thereof the remainder must be collected by a suit against the United States, which will be a hardship to compel the owner to resort to this means to recover his full compensation.

Section 10 authorizes the President, when it is necessary to secure adequate supply, to requisition and take over for the use of the Government any mine and to operate the same, and to compensate the owner to the extent of 75 per cent of the amount thereof, and to compel him to collect the remainder by a suit against the United States.

Under this section as amended the President is authorized to use and operate said mine without regard to the wishes of the owner.

Under section 25, which is a new section added by the Senate, the President is authorized to fix the price of coal and coke "whenever and wherever sold, either by producer or dealer," and if the owner fails to conform to such price the President is authorized "to requisition and take over the plant and business," and, further, the President is authorized by the same section to "prescribe such regulations as he may deem essential for the employment, control, and compensation of the employees necessary to conduct the same."

The same section further provides by a new provision, which has never been considered here, added thereto the President is "hereby empowered and authorized to require any or all producers of coal and coke, either in any special area or in any special coal fields, or in the entire United States, to sell their products only to the United States through an agency to be designated by the President, such agency to regulate the resale of such coal and coke, and the prices thereof, and to fix the compensation to be paid to producers by the United States, and to establish rules for the regulation of and to regulate the methods of production, transportation, distribution, apportionment, or storage thereof among merchants and consumers, domestic or foreign, and to make payment of the purchase price thereof to the producers thereof, or to the person or persons legally entitled to said payment."

Thus it will be seen that if this bill becomes a law the coal industry of the United States is practically taken away from the rightful owners, and put under the jurisdiction of the food dictator, and the wages of the workers in and about the coal and coke works of the United States is to be fixed by the President.

Just why the coal and coke business of the country is made a target at this time for such drastic action as here proposed does not appear. If this bill is enforced fully, it will mean the destruction of this industry. It means to drive out of employment the men who are engaged in it, earning wages now at as high a rate as any labor, skilled or unskilled, in the whole United States.

This bill can only be characterized in some of its sections as an attack on this important and widespread industry.

The twenty-second congressional district of Pennsylvania, which I represent, composed of the counties of Westmoreland and Butler, last year produced over 20,000,000 tons of bituminous coal, employed in that industry over 15,000 men, representing a population well onto 75,000, which represents a money investment of upward of $200,000,000. I therefore can not sit silent and see this industry demoralized without making a protest.

Bituminous coal is produced in 30 States of the Union, but Pennsylvania leads them all in this great basic industry, and it is high time that the Representatives of the other States in which the mining industry exists were taking notice of this attack upon coal.

This bill, because coal is now selling at a high price, fails to correct the two fundamental causes. The coal operators are not to blame for the high price of coal; neither are the coal miners, and in the name of both of these I protest here against the wrongful treatment of the bituminous coal-mining industry by this food bill.

The two fundamental causes of the high price of coal are:

1. Lack of transportation facilities.

2. Increased cost of all materials that enter into the production of coal.

For instance, the increased cost of the various articles and commodities necessary to the production of coal between April 1, 1914, and July 1, 1917, as furnished by the leading bituminous coal company of western Pennsylvania are as follows:

Increase of wages 37½ per cent.
Increase in the cost of corn for feed from 78 cents to $2.44.
Oats from 42 cents to 77 cents.
Pit posts increased 65 per cent.
Pit ties increased 100 per cent.
Lumber increased 100 per cent.
Copper wire and copper fixtures increased 125 per cent.
Cement and cement pipe increased 80 per cent.
Iron pipe, wrought iron and cast, increased 200 per cent.
Electric locomotives and mine machines increased 100 per cent.
Pit cars increased from $38 to $200.
Bar iron increased from $27 to $110 per ton.
Bit steel and smithing steel increased from $100 per ton to $240 per ton.
Steel rails increased from $23 to $100 per ton.
Spikes from $31 to $140 per ton.
Mules and horses from 50 to 100 per cent.

The increased cost of coal has been from $1.50 to $3 and $4, and in some instances $5 per ton, for coal that was not under contract, but 75 per cent of the coal of the large corporations is under contract to the railroads, steel companies, and other manufacturing concerns that purchase it under long-time contracts, where the advance has not been greater than an average of from $1 to $2.50 per ton.

It is, therefore, unfair to say that the price of coal has been advanced all around from 100 to 300 per cent; a fair average advance has been about 100 per cent, taking the contract and free coal both into consideration, which is the only fair way to estimate it, while the cost of materials has advanced over 100 per cent. The advance in coal is not greater than the advance in other commodities.

Now, it is proposed by this bill to ignore everything except the cost of coal, and to seize the mines and take them away from the rightful owners, without regulating the cost of any of the commodities which have rendered necessary the advance in the price of coal. Why not regulate the price of cotton, of copper, of iron, of lumber? These basic articles are almost as important as coal and are controlling in fixing the price of coal. Because cotton is a southern product the majority of this House protect it.

It must not be overlooked that if the price of coal is to be reduced the price of wages must also be reduced. The miners and coke workers of my district are making to-day more than they ever made. But if their wages are to be reduced, then the price of flour, meat, sugar, coffee, clothing, and shoes, which these men must buy and consume, must also be reduced. A fair statement of the situation as it prevails in western Pennsylvania and throughout the mining region generally is that although the men are making more money they have to pay so much more for the necessities of life that when they pay their debts at the end of the semimonthly pay period they have less money left than they had before the recent advance in the price of all these necessaries of life occurred.

Therefore, Mr. President, in the name of not only the coal men, but in the name of the coal miners and the day laborers about the mines, and the whole coal industry regardless of their employment, I protest against fixing of the price of coal as proposed in this bill by seizing the coal mines.

The Federal Trade Commission has characterized the whole coal industry, as the result of its investigation recently made, as one in which no profit was made from 1900 to 1915. Hence, to make this industry a special target now is unfair and unjust.

The second great cause of the high price of coal is the lack of transportation facilities.

Of this phase of the coal situation, the Federal Trade Commission says:

> The present production of bituminous coal the country over is about 40 per cent short of the possible maximum, and this limitation is solely to be charged, as to primary cause, to faulty rail transportation. The present demand for coal is unprecedented, but the mines now open are capable of filling this demand if adequate car supply is furnished.

Hence we see that but 60 per cent of the cars are furnished to the coal industry it requires, and, while it is true the railroads have only been permitted to increase their freight rates 15 per cent, yet the coal that moves by water has been compelled to pay greatly increased freights. For example, the cost of the water haul from New York to Boston, which was caused by poor transportation by rail, has increased from 50 cents to $3 per ton, and from Newport News, from 70 cents and 90 cents to $3.50 and $4 per ton to New England points.

In addition to this there is springing up all over the country a large number of mines, known as "wagon mines," to which the various public-service commissions of the different States have compelled the railroads to furnish cars, and these cars are tied up more or less, but these new mines have furnished a vast amount of coal and have given employment to many men who would not work in the public coal mines. In many instances it costs from $1 to $2 to haul this coal from the mines and put it in the cars. If this bill is put into effect and the price fixed under it, such as has been suggested, at $3 per ton, practically all these mines will go out of commission, and instead of stimulating and increasing the output of coal the result will be directly opposite, the production of coal will be diminished.

In the latter part of June the Secretary of the Interior summoned the coal operators of the country to meet the coal production committee of the Board of National Defense to discuss the coal situation and fix prices. It was currently printed in the public press that a price of $3 was agreed upon as the amount to be paid, to which these various coal operators assented. After they had returned to their homes it was also generally reported in the public press, and not denied, that the Secretary of the Navy and the Secretary of War refused to abide by this arrangement of the Board of National Defense and stated that coal would have to be produced at $1.50 per ton, which under existing conditions means that the wages of every man that works in and about the coal mines will have to be reduced, and greatly reduced, and that all the supplies that enter into the production of coal will have to be reduced in price, and that even then a large number of the mines of the country—in fact, all the small ones—will either be closed up or go into bankruptcy.

Against this course, Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the miners and operators and all those interested in the coal industry, not only of Pennsylvania but of the Nation, I enter my defiant protest.

It must be remembered, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, that section 25 of this bill has never been considered by the House of Representatives and no opportunity was given to analyze or discuss it. It was inserted by the Senate and has been modified by the conferees.

By the Senate amendment it was provided that the President had the power to fix wages, and any workman who was dissatisfied with the wages fixed could appeal to the Board of Mediation and Conciliation; but in the bill as it is amended this right of appeal is taken out and the law now stands thus:

> While operating or causing to be operated any such plants or business the President is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he may deem essential for the employment, control, and compensation of the employees necessary to conduct the same.

Workmen have no right of appeal. The President or some agency that may be unfamiliar with the various mining districts, thickness of the vein, working conditions, or proper compensation are here clothed with the absolute power to fix wages, and that is the end of it. This is improper, drastic, and unreasonable. To allow the workmen to have no voice whatever in fixing their compensation or working conditions, and then allow them to have no right to appeal from an unjust decision of those who fixed them is wrong. Against any such proposition I am unalterably opposed. This is equally unfair to employer and employee.

It would hardly be possible to draft a more impracticable and unreasonable law to govern and control any business than this. To apply this rule simply means to take charge of the coal properties and operate them and take from the owners their possession, ownership, operation, and care of the property, and all this simply because it is alleged that coal is selling in the market at a price above what it should be sold at.

How is it possible to work out any such plan as this?

The output of bituminous coal in the United States is approximately 2,200,000 tons a day. At the average cost price of $2 a ton it would require $4,400,000 to pay for the product of the mines each day. How could the United States Government possibly place men at all the mines, regulate the production, and pay for the same and handle this immense business? In addition to being unreasonable and illegal, this whole program is impossible and impracticable.

Then, again, if this coal is taken over it must be sold and disposed of. How is the Government going to carry out any such gigantic business operation as this and at the same time engage in this gigantic war?

This bill has no respect for existing contracts, because it provides that after 15 days' notice to private owners the United States will purchase all the coal, and although the railroads may be depending on it, yet such coal must be turned over to the Government. This violates the sacred terms of all contracts then in existence. Although these contracts may be made at a greater figure than the Government would fix, the purchaser will have to meet the Government price, and the free coal on which the coal operator is making a profit to carry him through on the low-price contract, wherein he loses. All these conditions are disregarded, the parties to the contract are treated as if they were infants, and the property taken out of their hands, and should any coal producer violate the provisions of this bill he is met by a penal clause, which subjects him to a fine of $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than two years, or both, with the added warning that each individual contract will be construed as a separate offense. By this provision it might be possible, where an operator has failed to comply, who is engaged in filling a number of small contracts, to be met with prosecution at any time and be subject to many fines. In fact, the whole coal business by this section is simply raped out of existence. Just why a bill which is aimed at the existing evil of food manipulation should contain a provision of this kind is difficult to understand. It is, therefore, a matter of astonishment that a bill containing such an unreasonable clause should be passed by a legislative body containing 435 Members, coming from all over the Union, when bituminous coal is produced in at least 30 of the States, and only two Members would enter their solemn protest against it.

The bituminous coal produced in the United States last year amounted to 509,000,000 tons, three-fourths of which was mined in Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Illinois, and Ohio, and the remaining one-fourth in 26 other States. As near as can be ascertained, there are about 5,000 producers engaged in mining coal for commercial purposes. There is now in existence the Sherman law, which prevents any unlawful combinations among these producers to enhance the price, and it is believed that there is now no such combination or agreement in existence anywhere. The price of coal, as has been shown heretofore, is not unreasonably high compared with other commodities, and the present price of coal is the result entirely of the failure of transportation facilities, the high cost of material entering into the production of coal, and the scarcity of labor. Strange to say, this bill apparently makes no effort to cure either one of these three evils, but aims at the coal operator, and proposes to make a martyr out of him by imprisoning him and bringing financial ruin by seizing his property and cause widespread distress by throwing his miners out of work, all because, under the inevitable business conditions, his product has been forced up in price.

Another remarkable situation is that the Federal Trade Commission was, by a resolution of Congress adopted July 22, 1916, directed to investigate these conditions, and a long, thorough investigation was made and a finding promulgated by this commission, and, among many other things, the commission says:

> The commission believes that the coal industry is paralyzing the industries of the country and that the coal industry itself is paralyzed by the failure of transportation.

But the Trade Commission further says that there are sufficient cars and sufficient railroad facilities in the country, if properly operated, to carry all the coal to market, and if the coal is properly marketed the whole situation will be cleared and right itself in a short time.

The commission condemns this bill, in this respect, namely, uniformity of price, in these words:

> If a uniform price were fixed, many mines would be shut down, unless the price is high enough to make the highest cost mine profitable.

How, then, can the section above quoted be enforced? There are in the United States approximately 2,600,000 privately owned and railroad-owned cars, of which 6 per cent, or 156,000, are always out of repair. Many of these cars are used by the railroads for company use, and as storage bins, standing at terminal points and at coal sidings. Another very large number is routed by circuitous routes and kept out of use.

Another very large number is placed and held for loading at small mines longer than is necessary, and it is confidently believed and the Trade Commission finds it as a fact, as a result of their investigation, that if the rolling stock of the railroads could be operated as a unit and could be mobilized, so as to care for the large demands of the coal trade, there would be adequate transportation to convey all the coal to market that was needed, and if the market could be supplied and maintained that there would be no further trouble about high cost of coal and no further shortage in the supply.

In fact the Trade Commission, after its investigation, which has been very thorough and extended all over the country, makes the following recommendation as a complete solution for the whole coal trouble:

1. That the production and distribution of coal and coke be conducted through central agencies under the supervision of the Government; and

2. That the transportation agencies of the United States, both rail and water, also operate under the supervision of the Government, and that all such means of transportation be operated as a unit, the owning corporations being paid a just and fair compensation for use of its equipment, which would cover the normal net profit, upkeep, and betterments.

In fact this is practically what the railroads have been doing for some time, so that they are now all operated through a central agency in Washington for the movement of Government freight, and by adding the movement of coal the recommendations of the Trade Commission would be effective at once.

This plan would leave the coal properties in the hands of their owners, who can best operate them. It would permit the movement of railroad transportation to be under the direction of an efficient corps of operators of the various interests which own and control the transportation lines, and it is believed and confidently asserted, not only on the authority of the Trade Commission, but as a sound business proposition, that with these two interests acting in harmony the coal operators would receive a proper liberal and reasonable profit from the operation of their properties, and the coal miners would continue to receive the present high standard of wages, which is necessary so long as prevailing high prices of necessities are in effect, and that the whole situation would clarify and normal conditions would naturally and easily be resumed.

I therefore, in the name of the owners of the coal properties and the miners and laborers employed thereat, protest against the enforcement of this drastic provision of the food-control bill in the case of bituminous coal, and I believe I voice the sentiment of all the people engaged in this industry, whether operators or miners, and believe further that the plan above suggested is the only one that will inure to the benefit of the public and do justice to all concerned in this great industry.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, it was inevitable that something would have to be done to regulate the constantly mounting price of foodstuffs, just as it was apparent to students of world conditions that if the European war continued for any length of time we would sooner or later be drawn into its vortex; just so was it apparent that with the food-producing population of the Old World engaged in the devastating occupation of war, with the rich plains and valleys of Europe being overrun by the iron heel of the warring nations, and this country endeavoring to supply their needs, it was but a foregone conclusion that we must have either one of two things—either an embargo or governmental regulation.

We adopted a limited embargo on certain articles some time ago, and we now provide for the latter in this bill which has been agreed upon between the conference committee of the two Houses.

In peace times Great Britain raises about one-fourth of her bread and France about one-half. Heretofore they have drawn supplies from Russia, Roumania, and Bulgaria. For three years a wall of flame has shut them off. Day by day the vacuum of Europe's needs has drawn upon our resources. One warring power has bid against the other. Brokers, speculators, and middlemen have taken advantage of the needs of countless millions engaged in the grim business of war, of men who had ceased to produce and are in the trenches or engaged in forging implements of slaughter.

Men of strong capacity and an intimate knowledge of just what was being produced, of the difficulties of transportation and distribution, and with vast sums at their disposal, have added from 50 to 200 per cent profit upon all necessaries while traveling from the producer to the consumer.

The chief staple, which averaged the American farmer $1.51 per bushel for last year's crop, was sold at such prices as to force the price of flour to $15 and $16 a barrel, when it should have sold for from $7.50 to $8.

Every other necessary soared also, and when finally this country declared war the people of the land began to cry out in protest against existing prices.

Obtainable reports showed that our crops were fully 25 per cent below the amount required to feed this country and our foreign allies.

Stringent laws became necessary. Prevention of waste, prohibition of speculation and of hoarding were demanded.

In no other way could we hope to keep our people at work and at war and meet the great emergency thrust upon us. And so, taking the position that the welfare and preservation of the Nation was paramount to any and all of its existing laws, we began to agitate for broader powers, for authority to cut down the profits accruing to nonproducers and brokers, to prevent duplication and repetition of transportation, to punish the hoarding and destroying of foods to bolster up the market, and to simplify the distribution from the producer to the consumer by as direct a route as possible.

The Council of National Defense threw its energy and talent into the problem and recommended that Mr. Herbert C. Hoover be called upon to serve in this hour of the country's need.

Some of us met with him. We found him a man singularly modest, gifted with the faculty of clearly stating his thoughts and inspiring confidence, a man accustomed to the handling of great problems and possessing the magnetism necessary to gather about him men of ability, of proven success in their chosen fields, and willing to lend their aid for the common good.

We found him in deadly earnest and anxious to carry out his plans, but with no authority to do so except to seek voluntary cooperation.

A committee waited upon the President and urged that he hasten the enactment of the necessary legislation.

We found the President anxious and willing to do so, but doubtful as to the means to produce results.

In fact, those who were engaged in dealing with the terms of the bill were more or less uncertain as to just what powers were necessary.

We were embarking upon an unknown sea.

There is no past history, there are no precedents to guide us.

The only thing agreed upon was the necessity for haste, for regulation before the crops began to move.

Already in the early part of June signs of the speculator and food hoarder were in evidence.

Unless the legislation was hastened the man or the men choosen would be helpless.

And so the legislation before Congress was sidetracked and this bill was given the right of way.

June 23, after about a week's debate, it passed the House with only a few dissenting votes and went to the Senate.

And then the country was treated to one of the strangest spectacles ever witnessed in the history of the American Government.

With the country crying for relief from existing prices, with people suffering for food, with the fact already apparent that we were unable to supply the allies with more than 60 per cent of their needs, men rose day after day on the floor of the Senate and spent hour after hour vilifying the man who was to be given broad powers under this bill, as though he had committed some crime in giving his services to the people of America to do his part in winning the war.

I do not think that Mr. Hoover claims to be gifted with omniscient and impeccable powers.

Speaking before the Senate Committee on Agriculture, he is reported to have said:

> I do not believe I can do this job; I do not believe that any man living can, but I may last six months and pave the way for the man to come after me.

I venture the assertion that some of the men who have belittled and besmirched him from the floor of the Congress would not even admit that they were incapable of solving any of the problems confronting us.

But, finally, after delaying the bill with all kinds of extraneous propositions never dreamed of by Mr. Hoover, or any of its sponsors, we have about decided to place this instrument in his hands and bid him go forth and do a man's work; to bring order out of chaos, to accomplish the seemingly impossible.

I do not hope or think he will accomplish the setting aside of all or any natural laws, or that he will at once bring relief to the people of the New World and of the Old, who are engaged in this grim business of war, but I do feel that the broad grants of power conveyed in this bill will be in the hands of a man who will not abuse them; that he will go forward through the days and nights of strife and sacrifice, and endeavor to bring to each American home the necessaries they need with all possible unearned profits eliminated.

And surely we need some central authority, some responsible head, at this time.

To-day there exists only confusion and duplication of efforts. What is done to-day is undone and contradicted to-morrow. Meanwhile the profiteers continue to profit.

The bituminous mine owners of the country were called here some time ago, and volunteered—some say were forced under threat of confiscation—to reduce the price of free coal—that is, coal not under contract—to $3 per ton at the mines, when they had been obtaining from $5 to $7.

A few days later the Secretary of War repudiated this agreement and stated that coal would have to be reduced to $1.50 per ton.

The prices which obtain to-day in the coal trade are made by the buyers, by the unprecedented demand for fuel.

The high prices have encouraged the working of difficult and abandoned workings.

Men have even engaged in digging the out-cropping coal and hauling this to the railroads in wagons and automobile trucks.

They can only do this when prices are high, for it costs from $1 to $2 per ton more to put this coal on the car than by the machinery of the modern mine.

This should be recognized by the Government, for to bring relief in this matter of coal prices we must not decrease the production.

The President or his representative can do nothing which will better conditions in the coal trade so much as to see that the railroads furnish cars as they are needed. This has been one of the great problems confronting the mine owners of the country.

Due to red tape, to duplication of transportation, to embargoes at the ports of shipment, not more than 60 per cent of the required hauling facilities have been available at the mine.

The Government can, and I trust will, remedy this condition by providing for priority in needed shipments of this and other commodities.

And it must be borne in mind that the Government should not lower the price of this commodity to such a degree as to make necessary a readjustment of wages, and it can not in fairness reduce their wages without lowering the cost of those commodities which they eat and wear, and which have increased from 60 to 150 per cent during the past three years.

I believe that Government regulation does not necessarily mean monetary loss nor confiscation to the American producers.

And when they made a price of $3 a ton at the mine they were cognizant of the fact that everything connected with the cost of production had increased, that labor in the mines had gone up in the past three years 37 per cent, mining props 65 per cent, crossties 100 per cent, lumber 100 per cent, steel rails 300 per cent, horses and mules from 50 to 100 per cent, machinery and tools 100 per cent, and feed from 100 to 125 per cent.

And the men who made the arrangement referred to no doubt had those things in mind, and a further investigation will convince the Secretary of War that this arrangement which saved the consumer from $2 to $4 a ton was not such a bad thing for the country.

Then the Secretary of the Navy issued a statement that he had purchased coal for the Navy last year at $1.38 per ton.

Anyone familiar with the conditions in the coal trade knows that coal can not be mined under present conditions at that figure; that if the Secretary purchased coal at that figure it must have been the product of some poorly paid and terrorized nonunion miners, where wages were low, where housing conditions were bad, and where the "pluck me" company store flourishes, and reduced the miner to a state of peonage.

I have been steadfast in the belief that governmental regulation does not necessarily mean confiscation, and that the business under restraint was to be destroyed. I have not now lost that faith and belief.

If we destroy industry, we decrease production.

If we decrease production, the natural laws of supply and demand will force the prices up.

This is recognized by the insertion of the section providing for a minimum price of $2 for wheat in 1918, which is to encourage the planting of a vast acreage for next year by the farmers of the country.

It is hoped by this method to have the natural laws reduce existing prices.

The Government can not compel the producer to continue his business at a loss, and no one, I believe, has any such idea. We can hope to keep profits within reasonable bounds.

The authority given in section 10 of this bill, which gives the President power to requisition and take over and operate the mines and compensate the owners to the extent of 75 per cent of the amount thereof, and compel them to collect the remainder by suit against the United States, will, to my mind, never be used.

How is a Government engaged in a world war going to carry on a gigantic business such as this, involving the production of more than two and one-half million tons per day?

How are they to man and oversee and supervise the operation of more than 5,000 mines? All this under our system of government, with men appointed because of their political usefulness, with the word going out to put only men of a certain party in charge, with the President prescribing the regulations, the control, and the compensation of the employees as provided in this bill.

It is unthinkable unless we are ready to adopt paternalism or communism, or unless we believe that Utopia is here—that all greed, all selfishness, all desire for self-aggrandizement and self-elevation has been eliminated, and the brotherhood of man at last realized.

I feel that this is an unsafe and untenable proposition.

I do not know why this one industry has been singled out for governmental control or confiscation if the men engaged in it do not hew to the line marked out for them arbitrarily when cotton, steel, iron, and copper are not mentioned. There is some reason, I am sure, which the conferees have not made clear to us. This section was not in the bill when it passed the House; it should not be in it now. It can only serve to embarrass the food administrator. The Government is not yet ready to take over the coal mines or any other public utility.

They will not be until we can change human nature, or at least change our system of government so the public official will be forced to give a fair day's attention to his duty and not practice law or medicine or run a country store "back home."

But believing, as I do, it will never be utilized, I shall vote for the conference report as I voted for the bill, confident that the powers here given will not be used to elevate or benefit one class of our people above another, but that they will be used to benefit and relieve the whole country, the men and women of America, who are now looking to the Government under which they live to lead the way in this great struggle of free people against autocracy and despotism, and who, because of the sacredness of their cause, are now ready to give their all, even life itself, to the common good; that nations governed by a despot may never again draw the sword upon free and untrammeled people.

I venture the assertion that the word "confiscation" which appears in this bill will never be used in that sense, and that the regulatory powers will be found sufficient to cope with the problems growing out of this conflict and will be found sufficient to cause men to put patriotism above profits in this hour of the Nation's need. With these high ideals before us, who is so base that he will not, day in and day out, do his part and meet such duties and responsibilities as he must face with fearless determination to play his part as a man and as an American?

Mr. DILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman ask to extend his remarks on this bill?

Mr. DILL. On this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that when this bill came back from conference it would contain the provision regarding prohibition that was placed in it by the House; and while I think the conferees have greatly improved the provisions of the Senate bill regarding prohibition it is not as it should be, in my judgment. But the country is very anxious to have this food bill enacted into law, and so I believe it is better to accept it as it is than it would be to delay its enactment. There are so many excellent provisions now in this bill as it has come from conference that I have not the time to review them in detail, but I desire to mention especially the provision against hoarding. Early in the session I introduced a bill covering almost this identical subject matter, and I believe it will prove of great value to the President in protecting the people against the exorbitant prices they are being compelled to pay. The men who would hoard food at a time like this should be dealt with severely, and I have no doubt but that the President will so deal with them when this bill becomes a law.

The provisions for the regulation of the prices of coal, the minimum of $2 per bushel for wheat, and the power to commandeer food products when necessary are all such excellent ones that I believe this conference report should pass unanimously. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the conference report.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, is it on this bill?

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I have no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the conference report, as, I presume, will also every other Member of the House. I have arisen at this time not to discuss the report, but simply to say a word in the interest, as I hope at least, of historical accuracy. We have heard so much about the committee on the conduct of the war of 1861 to 1865 that I thought possibly we had better read what John Nicolay and John Hay, the private secretaries of Abraham Lincoln, said about that committee. They probably knew as well as does anybody of this generation whether that committee rendered good service or bad, and whether it was worthy of having a successor. The President in his letter to the gentleman from South Carolina has severely condemned the committee, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has just said that his recollection is that it did no good service. The President asks that the Senate amendment be defeated, that no committee be appointed during this war, and declares that the committee during the Civil War made Lincoln's task almost impossible. But John Nicolay and John Hay, the men who of all men were closest to Lincoln through those four terrible years, who witnessed his trials and knew his innermost thoughts, said of the committee on the conduct of the war:

Congress convened on the 2d of December, and one of its earliest subjects of discussion was the Battle of Ball's Bluff. Roscoe Conkling in the House of Representatives and Zachariah Chandler in the Senate brought forward resolutions for the appointment of committees to investigate and determine the responsibility for that disaster, but on motion of Grimes, of Iowa, the Senate chose to order a permanent joint committee of three Senators and four Representatives to inquire into the conduct of the war.

I pause to say that this committee of 1861–1865 possessed and exercised very much more power than was ever proposed to be given to the committee to be created under the Senate amendment to this bill. The Senate amendment provided simply for a committee to act during the present war and keep Congress informed as to contracts and expenditures.

This action was unanimously agreed to by the House and the committee was appointed, consisting of Senators B. F. Wade, Chandler, and Andrew Johnson, and of Representatives Gooch, Covode, Julian, and Odell. This committee, known as the Committee on the Conduct of the War, was for four years one of the most important agencies in the country. It assumed, and was sustained by Congress in assuming, a great range of prerogative. It became a stern and zealous censor of both the Army and the Government; it called soldiers and statesmen before it and questioned them like refractory schoolboys. It claimed to speak for the loyal people of the United States, and this claim generally met with the sympathy and support of a majority of the people's representatives in Congress assembled. It was often hasty and unjust in its judgments but always earnest, patriotic, and honest; it was assailed with furious denunciation and defended with headlong and indiscriminating eulogy; and on the whole it must be said to have merited more praise than blame.

[Applause.]

That committee "merited," said Lincoln's secretaries, "more praise than blame."

It helped to keep this country safe for democracy. [Applause.] And, too, it helped to expose some of the graft which otherwise would have been kept a secret from the people of the United States.

What I have read is found on pages 150 and 151, volume 5, of Nicolay and Hay's biography of Abraham Lincoln. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I suppose that my remarks will strike an unpleasant discord in the harmonious chorus of congratulations which have been showered upon the committee. I know that I have been beaten in my amendment. I shall make a last effort on a motion to recommit, which I have here, and if I am defeated then I shall extend my congratulations to the chairman of the committee, but with him will rest the responsibility and the blame of putting into this bill a system whereby slackers, incompetents, favorites, and relatives may find easy jobs in Washington. When the food-survey bill was under discussion I introduced an amendment requiring all employees to come under the civil service, and that was ruled out upon a point of order. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture at the time raised the point that this was an emergency measure; that employees would be required imediately; and that we could not resort to the civil-service requirements. I then took up the matter with the Civil Service Commission and presented the report of the Civil Service Commission here when the food bill was under discussion, and after hearing that letter the House voted for my amendment requiring that all employees should come under the civil service by a vote of 175 to 135. The bill went to the Senate, and some of the gentlemen there stated that Mr. Hoover had intimated that civil-service rules would hamper him; that he could not find the right kind of employees and could not avail himself of the personnel he now has. I then took up the matter with Mr. Hoover, and he stated that of his present staff not more than 12 men would he classify as specialists or men with such extraordinary experience that could not be obtained from civil-service lists. That letter was before this House and is in the RECORD.

The chairman of the committee had notice of it. After that letter went into the RECORD I received another letter from the Civil Service Commission, which, with your permission, I shall insert in the RECORD.

UNITED STATES CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., July 26, 1917.

Hon. FIORELLO H. LAGUARDIA,
House of Representatives.

SIR: The commission has the honor to advise you that its attention has been called to the copy of letter from the Hon. Herbert Hoover under date of July 14, 1917, appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 24. It is noted that the one point raised by Mr. Hoover in this letter is that the civil-service system should be elastic enough "to meet the present situation" to the extent that the voluntary services of experts may be accepted, and that the services of paid employees already in the organization pending the passage of legislation may be retained.

The civil-service system already provides, and has provided for years, for the acceptance of what amounts to voluntary service on the part of experts. This authority is found in that section of the civil service rules which provides that where the commission is satisfied that the qualifications are so rare or the compensation so low that competition would not result from an examination, appointment may be authorized without competitive examination.

There is also provision in the civil service rules whereby it is possible to retain the services of persons temporarily employed pending the passage of legislation under circumstances similar to those present in this case.

By direction of the commission.

Very respectfully,
JOHN A. MCILHENNY,
President.

It will be seen that the contention by Mr. Hoover that the civil-service law should be more elastic to meet the present situation is not well founded. The law is sufficiently elastic, and he could appoint these men under the law as it exists. Of course, it is not sufficiently elastic to make wholesale appointments of minor positions, such as clerks, examiners, inspectors, stenographers, and so forth. So, then, in the face of this evidence what other interpretation can be put upon the action of the committee than that they want jobs, and there are $2,500,000 in this bill and $11,000,000 in the food survey bill to gratify these partisan desires. Oh, yes; Mr. Hoover can say that he has men who can render special services and who are patriotic and willing to render such services—I do not question their patriotism or ability. Some, a few, are really indispensable. But you show me a man of middle age or a young man who comes to Washington and says that he is too good for the trenches, that he can render more valuable service here at a desk, and I will show you in that man a yellow streak a foot wide. [Applause.] Yes; the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] stated that this is no place for politics. He stated that you should put politics aside, but you have not done so. You have not put politics aside when you refused the amendment which was passed in this House. [Applause and cheers.] Oh, yes; you can make as much noise as you want, but at least when I say something to a man I say it to his face. I do not wait until he is absent. [Applause.]

The chairman of the committee stated that he was doing the bidding of this House, and yet he ignored the bidding of this House when he permitted the civil-service amendment, which passed by a vote of 175 to 135, to be stricken out. All through the departments, right in the corridors of our office buildings, there have been slinking around for weeks men who are waiting for the enactment of this law. The Civil Service Commission stated they could furnish daily as many men as the administration requires. And yet you refuse that, because you want these jobs to hand out.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER]. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. LEVER. I yield all the remainder of the time to Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi, who will close the debate for this important bill. [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the Members that they shall have an opportunity to vote in a very few minutes. I feel greatly honored in being permitted to close the debate on this great bill of such far-reaching importance to the American people; and I assure you, all I shall say will be in the interest of harmony and good feeling. [Applause.] The gentleman from New York, who has just addressed the House, referred to the civil-service proposition. That matter is not now in this bill as it stands at the present time. The whole conference report is before you, and you can do with it as you please. These employees, I am advised, will be under civil service, except the ones that are experts, whether his proposed amendment be adopted or not. Therefore the amendment is not material.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I decline to yield; I have not the time. The gentleman has occupied some time in presenting that proposition. He is very solicitous in this House about taking care of jobs which he thinks may be handed out. I have been here a good deal longer than he has; the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture has been here a great deal longer than he has, and I can testify for myself, and I think also for him, that we have not been handing out jobs and have not had the opportunity to do so. The services of employees of this Government have been rendered in the interest of the people, and the offices have been administered by officials of the Government in such a way as to bring about that result, and they will continue to be so administered with or without his amendment, especially in these good patriotic American times. [Applause.]

I am thankful myself and on behalf of all the House conferees, as well as the distinguished chairman of the conference committee on the part of the House [Mr. LEVER], who is the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture. I want to express appreciation for the many complimentary references about us in the speeches made upon the floor of the House to-day; but I want to say that, while all the members of the conference committee are entitled to credit, the distinguished chairman of our committee [Mr. LEVER] has taken care of the bill in conference and at all times been on the firing line, just exactly as he has taken care of it on the floor of the House, and borne the brunt of the sharpest conflicts, and, while we may have some credit coming to us all, the greatest credit for our success, if achieved, is due to him, and I do him the justice to-day to make this statement on the floor of the House, that credit may be accorded fully where credit is surely due. [Applause.]

This is a food bill—that is what it is intended to be—to control food, feeds, and fuel, and nothing else. It was confined to food, feeds, and fuel when it went from the House of Representatives to the Senate, and that is the way the conferees on the part of the House, who are the managers on the part of the House, tried to bring it back to the House of Representatives; and I think I can say without successful contradiction that we were successful in a very large measure in doing so, and therefore the bill which you passed in the outset is practically and in substance the same bill upon which you are called upon to vote now. [Applause.] While that is true, I believe in some respects the bill is better, and hence I fully indorse the remarks made by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] when he said a few moments ago that the bill as it now comes back to the House of Representatives is in some respects superior to the bill which passed the House and superior to the bill which passed the Senate. We did our best to improve it, and if we did so, then the 14 gentlemen who were conferees on the part of the House and Senate who brought about that result are sure enough entitled to a good deal of credit.

I know we labored with no other purpose in the world except for that which we believed to be for the interest of the country and for the welfare and prosperity of the people. What we desired to do was to give benefit to the consumer and benefit to the producer and eliminate the robbers and gamblers in food products throughout this country, and to bring about a result which would bless the homes and help the people around the firesides and bring gladness to the communities in which they live. [Applause.] That is the object and the purpose of the bill, and with this object in view in the conference committee we determined we would represent not so much the Senate, not so much the House, but try as best we could to represent the country at large and bring about the best possible results regardless of whether the Senate stood for it or whether the House stood for it. That is the bill as it now stands which we present to you, and we ask you to vote for it, and I hope there will not be a single, solitary vote against it. To have so many approve and compliment our work is very pleasing, indeed, and if we have succeeded in meeting your approval, I feel sure it has been accomplished because of the patriotic desire of each and all of the 14 conferees to eliminate politics, pride of opinion of the House or Senate, and meet the great questions on a broad, American platform. And now I appeal to each and all of you to stand on that same patriotic American platform, and, regardless of politics or pride of opinion, vote solidly and unanimously for this bill. Let us lose all differences in a unanimous patriotic vote. [Great applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SABATH. Would it be proper now to recommit with instructions to strike out the $2 and insert $1.50 as to the wheat proposition?

The SPEAKER. There is one motion to recommit before the House of which the Chair did not know.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. POWERS. To make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. POWERS. I have a motion to recommit pending.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is going to put the gentleman's motion. He did not know it was pending.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LANGLEY. Has there been given general leave to print?

The SPEAKER. There has not.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the motion of his colleague to recommit. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will it be in order to offer more than one motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The gentleman can offer an amendment to a motion to recommit or a substitute for it, but he can not offer two motions to recommit. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS] to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. POWERS moves to recommit the conference report on H. R. 4961, with instructions to the House conferees to disagree with Senate amendment 69, known as the Pomerene or Senate coal-price-fixing amendment.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, on that I move the previous question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I move to amend the motion to recommit——

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York was on his feet first.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to amend the motion now pending by instructing the conferees to insert the proviso stricken out by Senate amendment No. 61——

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that is not germane to this motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained. The gentleman from South Carolina moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the conference report.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina demands the yeas and nays. Evidently there is a sufficient number and the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 360, answered "present" 2, not voting 69, as follows:

YEAS—360.

Two provisos of the new section exempt storing or holding by any person of the products of any land cultivated by him, and also farmers and fruit growers, cooperative and other exchanges, or societies of a similar character. A third proviso is added, that the section shall not be construed to prohibit acquiring, storing, or holding for future sale for such advanced price as might prevail in the ordinary course of business and in a free and unrestricted market. The Senate recedes.

On amendment No. 32: This amendment inserts a new section 11, which makes all public surveyed unreserved lands within the States of New Mexico, Arizona, Colorado, Utah, and South Dakota, without further classification or action, subject to the provisions of the act of December 29, 1916, known as the 640-acre homestead act. If such request is not promptly complied with, the President is authorized to order the discontinuance of such dealings in futures and, if the order is not promptly complied with, to declare the exchange closed. Thereupon it is made unlawful to utilize such grain exchange or for any trader in grain to engage in the business theretofore conducted on such grain exchange. Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. LEVER. I give notice that I shall move the previous question at the end of 20 minutes.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Let us vote now.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I rise to move the previous question.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman is not recognized for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina, chairman of the committee, has the floor.

Mr. LEVER. I am more anxious than any other man on the floor to expedite this matter, but some of these gentlemen desire to have a word to say.

Mr. RUBEY. Will the gentleman yield for a moment.

Mr. LEVER. I yield for a question.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say to the gentleman that I am violently opposed to one particular part of this report, and I would like to be heard for two or three minutes.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Missouri is a member of the committee and should have that right.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield two or three minutes to this side?

Mr. LEVER. Certainly.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I should like to have two or three minutes.

Mr. LEVER. If it is in order, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from South Carolina yield the floor?

Mr. LEVER. No; I desire to yield to the gentleman from Georgia for a moment.

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman yields to me for the purpose of presenting two conference reports for printing in the RECORD.

Mr. LEVER. I do that if it is in order. I do not yield the floor, however.

Mr. ADAMSON. I desire to present conference reports on two bills, S. 1866 and S. 2356, to print in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not yield to the gentleman from Georgia for that purpose.

Mr. LEVER. Then I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The SPEAKER. The Chair again asks the gentleman from South Carolina if he has any motion or request to make? The Chair wishes to find out what we are doing.

Mr. LEVER. No; I simply give notice that I will move the previous question at the end of 20 minutes, and I am yielding five of those minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of asking recognition.

The SPEAKER. For what?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. To make a motion for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to recognize the gentleman, because the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] has charge of this bill.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. And he is entitled to the floor for an hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to recognize the gentleman from Michigan for the purpose stated. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the Senate added five public-land amendments to this bill. Some of them were good amendments and some of them were bad amendments. Two of them were amendments in which I was vitally interested, not personally, but for the group of States in the West that have to do with public lands. I had very much hoped that Senate amendment 32, which provided for the classification of public lands in the West, where 70,000 applicants are waiting to have the land classified, might have been dealt with so as to provide for classifying these lands and allowing these 70,000 applicants to have gotten on the land, because by so doing we would have been able to get some real food production. However, I do not criticize the House conferees, knowing how great a burden and how great a responsibility they have had. But I do want to say that it is extremely unfortunate that 70,000 families who are trying to get onto the land have not been provided for in some way in this bill.

There is $150,000 available to operate this bill, but that is only one and a half cents an acre, or only $2.50 for 640 acres. It is no part of the amount required to classify these lands. The bill passed December 29, 1916, and as yet not one claim has been classified. I feel that criticism will come on the House for not providing for it in this bill. The gentleman from South Carolina and his conferees could not do everything, and they are not permitted to know about public lands, and do not pretend to know, and what has happened, I fear, is that the Senate did not acquaint itself enough with the matter to insist upon their own rights.

Now, as to amendment 34. That provides that a million acres of land in Idaho can be entered and taken without any residence at all. That amendment ought not to have been agreed to. That amendment only makes trouble for succeeding days. If we give Idaho the right to take land without any residence at all, we will have to do the same thing with Colorado and California and all the rest of the Western States, which means giving away the public land without any bona fide residence at all. Of course I realize that nothing I can say and nothing I can do at this stage of the proceedings will modify this amendment to the bill. The major part of the bill is the food bill, which everyone wants and will agree to. What I do say is that it is extremely important when public-land amendments are added to these bills that some one who knows about public lands should be listened to rather than to allow amendments to go in which are not for the best interests of the country and not for the best interests of the West, and which could get but very few votes if they stood alone on their own bottom.

I would be denying myself a great pleasure if I did not congratulate the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] and his able committee. I have voted for both the bills all the way through. He has had plenty of ability and votes that were needed to do everything that was needed to be done with the two bills all the way through. He is able himself, and with his conferees was able to sweep a lot of things out of the bill which were not necessary. I regret that the only words I speak on the bill are to be in the nature of criticizing Senate amendments. When foreign amendments are added to a bill they ought to be stricken out or be gone into very carefully. The provision making a million acres of land in the West available without residence is practicing unfairness on other States. It is but borrowing trouble for the morrow, because if we afford relief of that kind for one State we must afford it for other States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why is the land in Idaho to be given away?

Mr. FERRIS. I am not presenting their side of it, but they contend that there is no water on the land and so men can not live there, which I assume is true. There are seven or eight other States that have land in exactly the same condition as that.

Mr. DILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. DILL. Is the land in Idaho any different from the land in Nevada that has been up before the committee?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think it is. If this is to be the policy, which I hope is not, several other States are entitled thereto. Senate amendment No. 32, known as the Fall amendment, directed a summary allowance of some 60,000 pending entries without any examination whatever. This would have allowed homestead applicants to secure large areas of Government land under the larger unit of 640 acres, which should in truth and in fact be entered under the smaller units. It would have allowed the entrymen to have secured timbered lands, mineral lands, irrigible lands, and other lands not properly falling under the 640-acre homestead law. Immediately upon examination of this Senate amendment the House Public Lands Committee was called together and consideration given to it. The House Public Lands Committee recommended as a substitute for Senate amendment 32 the following:

That for enabling the Secretary of the Interior to expedite the classification or designation of public lands for entry under the act of Congress approved December 29, 1916, known as the stock-raising homestead act, there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until June 30, 1918, $100,000, in addition to the amount heretofore appropriated: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to complete the classification or designation of land as provided in the stock-raising homestead act for which application has been made prior hereto within six months from the approval of this act or as soon thereafter as is practicable.

This provision was not agreed upon until after it had been submitted to the Interior Department, the Agricultural Department, the Geological Survey, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and met the approval of each of the departments. I can not help but feel that it is extremely unfortunate that some provision was not made so that these sixty or seventy thousand applicants might have their lands examined, might have the opportunity to go on the same and begin the production of food. The pending bill is a food bill. It was entirely proper to expect legislation of this sort to be dealt with, and while I know it was impossible for the House conferees to look after everything, it is exceedingly unfortunate that in the rush this had to be omitted. It works a severe injustice to the public-land States of the West. It ought to be remedied at the earliest possible moment.

The Interior Department has $150,000 available to carry on this work. Additional estimates ought to be made at once for a sufficient amount to carry this work forward. It is poor economy to allow this work to drag. It is unjust to the homesteader who is seeking to homestead these lands under the law. It is unjust to the West that is seeking development. It is a short-sighted policy all around.

I have appealed before to the Interior Department, the Geological Survey, the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and to the several committees to take some action regarding this matter, and I will continue to do so. I want to show complete diligence in this matter, for I am morally sure that just criticism will come to Congress and the departments if these 60,000 applications are not hastily and intelligently dealt with. I do not desire to longer detain the House.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. YOUNG].

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, there is one amendment added to the bill which I regret to find in the conference report. That is one that opens up the shipment of cattle from Mexico and the Central American country and around the Caribbean Sea. That proposition has been before the Agriculture Committee for some four or five years and invariably we have defeated the effort to open up our country to the shipment of cattle from that diseased section of the country.

Mr. Speaker, for years we have been spending hundreds and thousands of dollars on the part of this Government to rid the southern sections of this country from diseased cattle, and we have been making some headway during the past few years. I have had hopes that it would only be a short time before the great breeding ground would be rid of the cattle tick and diseases incident thereto. But when we open up this Pandora's box and permit cattle to be shipped from Mexico and Central American Republics and the islands of the seas, then it strikes me that it is a waste of money that we have been making in order to rid our section of the country from the disease we have been combating all these years. I understand that it is only a temporary proposition; but it is an entering wedge, and I want to sound the alarm. When the year is up I hope the fight may come again and be made to protect our country from these shipments. [Applause.]

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Yes; solely for the purpose of moving the previous question.

Mr. LEVER. The gentleman from Michigan, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN, is a member of the committee, and he desires to have two minutes; and, in view of the gentleman's attitude, I trust that other gentlemen will permit me to move the previous question at the conclusion of his remarks.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withhold his point of order or not?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say just a word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not say a word until the gentleman from Michigan withholds his point of order.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. I withhold it momentarily.

Mr. LEVER. I think we can arrange the matter and get through by the time we are talking about it. In five minutes more I shall move the previous question.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. With that understanding—that it will be done in five minutes—I withdraw the point of order. With other gentlemen, I have been waiting patiently now for weeks.

Mr. LEVER. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN].

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I heartily concur in every word that has been said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY]. It is absolutely unfair to import these cattle into the United States that can be obtained at a cost of less than 2 cents a pound. Cattle can be bought that weigh 800 pounds and imported into this country for $10. Those cattle can be had for 2 cents a pound in competition with the beef of the United States, and it is unfair. We have been appropriating hundreds of thousands of dollars for the eradication of the tick, and now we propose to import these cattle from the tick-infested districts, and that is all I care to say. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I now yield half a minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. WALTON].

Mr. WALTON. Mr. Speaker, I, too, regret exceedingly that the conferees on this bill (H. R. 4188) have seen fit to strike out the so-called Fall amendment inserted by the Senate, relative to the classification of lands under the stock-raising homestead act, without affording some relief to the applicants for homesteads under that act.

In New Mexico, practically every acre of the unappropriated public domain is subject to entry under that act. There are now pending in New Mexico over 3,000 entries, the majority of them original applications. When the so-called 640-acre act was passed by Congress, home seekers came into New Mexico from other States, bringing their families and their possessions with them, thinking that the land referred to in the law was immediately available. They are there yet, anxiously waiting for relief and suffering hardship and privation as a result of the long delay to which they have been subjected.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, an amendment to this bill providing for the immediate classification of these lands is strictly and essentially a part of the scheme of increased food production, which is the aim of the bill, for it is not yet too late to plant and raise dry-farming and bean crops in the State which I represent. I do not suppose that anything that I may say at this time will have any effect on the action of this House; but I deem it my duty to call attention to the injustice that has been and is being done to the people of New Mexico and to express my regret that advantage has not been taken of the opportunity to give relief to honest and deserving home seekers and home builders.

However, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to do or say anything which by any possibility could further delay action on this bill. I realize that there is an urgent demand on the part of the people of the entire country that something be done and done at once—a feeling that Congress has already wasted valuable time in a matter that vitally affects the personal interests of every man, woman, and child in the United States. I believe that there is some justification for this feeling, and speaking for the people of New Mexico, I say that it is better that we should suffer injustice a little longer, waiting for the right to prevail in the end, as it surely will, than that we should have any part in further delaying the passage of a measure that is imperatively needed for the relief of more than a hundred million American citizens.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield now to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HULBERT].

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, early in the session I brought to the attention of the House the question of the dehydrating of vegetables, and provision is made therefor in this bill under which I understand the Department of Agriculture is going to establish the first experimental station at Takoma Park, in the District of Columbia. I congratulate the committee upon the splendid achievement which will conserve the supply and reduce prices of fruits and vegetables. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I wish to speak briefly in reply to what has been said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY]. The Committee on Agriculture has heretofore refused, and during ordinary times would, I believe, continue to refuse, to recommend a measure of this kind, but now, when we are trying to increase the food supply, the number of meat animals, and the quantity of meat products, this has the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture and ought to be adopted. There is no danger in bringing tick-infested cattle into this country or of the spread of that disease. Tick-infested cattle are now being brought, and for years have been brought, from Mexico into the State of Texas, and there has been no spread of the cattle tick as a result. This bill requires that these imported cattle shall be slaughtered at the ports of entry, so there is no danger of spreading the cattle tick. It requires further that no cattle shall be permitted to come in if within six months they have been exposed to any other disease; they must be found upon inspection to be absolutely free of all diseases except the cattle tick. And it provides also for the proper inspection and treatment of hides, so that no disease shall be spread by use of the hides. In every respect the entire matter is safeguarded by provisos added at the suggestion or upon the demand of the conferees on the part of the House. The danger spoken of by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUBEY] does not exist. Importation of cattle from Mexico may possibly have a tendency to decrease the price of meat in this country, but if that will be the result we ought to welcome it. It was stated to us on the other hand, though, that these packers at the seacoast, where these cattle will be slaughtered, as the bill provides they shall be slaughtered at the ports of entry, will take advantage of existing high prices of cattle and meat and will not reduce the price, but by a provision in the food-control bill the President is authorized to control all packing houses and regulate prices, so that these new packers who will engage in the business of slaughtering cattle brought from Mexico, if they undertake unreasonably to increase the prices or improperly to hold up the prices, can be regulated and their prices can be regulated by invoking the provisions of the other bill. In my judgment this provision is entirely unobjectionable.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] has suggested that as the changes are so few and unimportant between the House bills that probably gentlemen would prefer to dispose of this now rather than meet in the morning.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to see them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects to any such request.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 4, 1917.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for the freedom with which Thou dost make men free. Thou dost destine us to the domination of the world by the principles of law and order founded upon Thy revealed will. Thou dost call us to a freedom not only from the forces of the world about us but from the lower forces that subject men to evil. Thou dost make us free in Christ Jesus. Grant, we pray, that we may have the spirit of Christ; that we may go forward in the work committed to our hands doing all for the honor and glory of Thy name and for the uplift of humanity. Smile upon us in our undertaking. Bring us speedily to victory. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Thursday last, when, on request of Mr. BRANDEGEE and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 70).

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the report of the conference committee on House bill 4961, commonly known as the food-control bill, was printed and before us yesterday, but the Senate was not in session. I hold in my hand a copy of the print of the bill as agreed to in conference. It is somewhat difficult for anyone not familiar with the way the bill is printed to understand exactly what is in it and what is not, because it carries the type with large portions of it stricken through, and there are all sorts of brackets and parentheses and different kinds of type—roman and italics.

I suggested to the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], that he have a clean print of it made, omitting what the conferees agreed to omit and inserting what they agreed to insert, so that it would read just as it would read when it was placed upon the United States statutes. The Senator said he would have that done; that it could be done without much trouble; but the copy did not get to the printers until too late, and they were unable to print a clean draft of it just as I suggested.

Inasmuch as this is a very important measure and the debate on the conference report may not be very illuminating unless the public may be able to see exactly what the bill in its final shape is, I ask that it may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD so that it will appear to-morrow in that shape.

Mr. NORRIS. May I suggest to the Senator that he ask unanimous consent to have it printed in parallel columns also?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is no objection to that being done also. I should like to have it printed in the ordinary type that the RECORD is printed in.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that, of course, but it is desirous that we shall have before us the bill as the conferees agreed to it and the bill as passed by the Senate in parallel columns. That would very materially assist us in the debate upon the proposition.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want to ask that, but I have no objection to the Senator asking it when I am through. I want to have it printed in the RECORD just as the conferees have agreed to it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that the present print striking out and inserting will give the material the Senator is desirous of having, for he will find the bill printed just as it will be the law if it is passed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then that is already printed in bill form.

Mr. NORRIS. If, however, it is printed in parallel columns, we would see exactly as the law would be if the conference report is agreed to. I will not object to the request of the Senator from Connecticut. I am willing that his request shall be put, and then I will make my request.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. As having the bill in charge, I will state that I have no objection in the world to having it printed as the Senator from Connecticut suggests, or in any other way that may be necessary to make its provisions clear. But does not the Senator's request involve the postponement of the bill?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would not think of asking that. I simply want it in to-morrow morning's RECORD, so that when there shall appear the desultory and scattered colloquies that have been engaged in in relation to different parts of the conference report, and probably only on those questions in dispute, the whole bill may be printed which the conference committee recommends, so that the public will know what we are talking about.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I rather thought the Senator's request would postpone the discussion of the report.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should not ask that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is my purpose to ask to have it taken up this morning.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I presume it will be taken up immediately. What I want is to have to-morrow's RECORD contain the measure as it would go upon the statute books if the conference report is agreed to, that the RECORD may also contain the measure that we are debating.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope that will be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The bill as agreed to in conference is as follows:

An act (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Be it enacted, etc., That, by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, fuel, including fuel oil and natural gas, and fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients, tools, utensils, implements, machinery, and equipment required for the actual production of foods, feeds, and fuel, hereafter in this act called necessaries; to prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, manipulations, and private controls, affecting such supply, distribution, and movement; and to establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war. For such purposes the instrumentalities, means, methods, powers, authorities, duties, obligations, and prohibitions hereinafter set forth are created, established, conferred, and prescribed. The President is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as are essential effectively to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That in carrying out the purposes of this act the President is authorized to enter into any voluntary arrangements or agreements, to create and use any agency or agencies, to accept the services of any person without compensation, to cooperate with any agency or person, to utilize any department or agency of the Government, and to coordinate their activities so as to avoid any preventable loss or duplication of effort or funds.

SEC. 3. That no person acting either as a voluntary or paid agent or employee of the United States in any capacity, including an advisory capacity, shall solicit, induce, or attempt to induce any person or officer authorized to execute or to direct the execution of contracts on behalf of the United States to make any contract or give any order for the furnishing to the United States of work, labor, or services, or of materials, supplies, or other property of any kind or character, if such agent or employee has any pecuniary interest in such contract or order, or if he or any firm of which he is a member, or corporation, joint-stock company, or association of which he is an officer or stockholder, or in the pecuniary profits of which he is directly or indirectly interested, shall be a party thereto. Nor shall any agent or employee make, or permit any committee or other body of which he is a member to make, or participate in making, any recommendation concerning such contract or order to any council, board, or commission of the United States, or any member or subordinate thereof, without making to the best of his knowledge and belief a full and complete disclosure in writing to such council, board, commission, or subordinate of any and every pecuniary interest which he may have in such contract or order and of his interest in any firm, corporation, company, or association being a party thereto. Nor shall he participate in the awarding of such contract or giving such order. Any willful violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be punishable by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or both: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not change, alter, or repeal section 41 of chapter 321, Thirty-fifth Statutes at Large.

SEC. 4. That it is hereby made unlawful for any person willfully to destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof; knowingly to commit waste or willfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in or in connection with their production, manufacture, or distribution; to hoard, as defined in section 6 of this act, any necessaries; to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any necessaries; to engage in any discriminatory and unfair, or any deceptive or wasteful practice or device, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge, in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries; to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict distribution of any necessaries; (d) to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof; or (e) to exact excessive prices for any necessaries or to aid or abet the doing of any act made unlawful by this section.

SEC. 5. That, from time to time, whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries, in order to carry into effect any of the purposes of this act, and shall publicly so announce, no person shall, after a date fixed in the announcement, engage in or carry on any such business specified in the announcement of importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries as set forth in such announcement, unless he shall secure and hold a license issued pursuant to this section. The President is authorized to issue such licenses and to prescribe regulations for the issuance of licenses and requirements for systems of accounts and auditing of accounts to be kept by licensees, submission of reports by them, with or without oath or affirmation, and the entry and inspection by the President's duly authorized agents of the places of business of licensees. Whenever the President shall find that any storage charge, commission, profit, or practice of any licensee is unjust, or unreasonable, or discriminatory and unfair, or wasteful, and shall order such licensee, within a reasonable time fixed in the order to discontinue the same, unless such order, which shall recite the facts found, is revoked or suspended, such licensee shall, within the time prescribed in the order, discontinue such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice. The President may, in lieu of any such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, find what is a just, reasonable, nondiscriminatory, and fair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, and in any proceeding brought in any court such order of the President shall be prima facie evidence. Any person who, without a license issued pursuant to this section, or whose license shall have been revoked, knowingly engages in or carries on any business for which a license is required under this section, or willfully fails or refuses to discontinue any unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, in accordance with the requirement of an order issued under this section, or any regulation prescribed under this section, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, cooperative association of farmers or gardeners, including livestock farmers, or other persons with respect to the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him, nor to any retailer with respect to the retail business actually conducted by him, nor to any common carrier, nor shall anything in this section be construed to authorize the fixing or imposition of a duty or tax upon any article imported into or exported from the United States or any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia: Provided further, That for the purposes of this act a retailer shall be deemed to be a person, copartnership, firm, corporation, or association not engaging in the wholesale business whose gross sales do not exceed $100,000 per annum.

SEC. 6. That any person who willfully hoards any necessaries shall upon conviction thereof be fined not exceeding $5,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both. Necessaries shall be deemed to be hoarded within the meaning of this act when either (a) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any person in a quantity in excess of his reasonable requirement for use or consumption by himself and dependents for a reasonable time; (b) held, contracted for, or arranged for by any manufacturer, wholesaler, retailer, or other dealer in a quantity in excess of the reasonable requirements of his business for use or sale by him for a reasonable time, or reasonably required to furnish necessaries produced in surplus quantities seasonally throughout the period of scant or no production; or (c) withheld, whether by possession or under any contract or arrangement, from the market by any person for the purpose of unreasonably increasing or diminishing the price: Provided, That this section shall not include or relate to transactions on any exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business as described in section 13 of this act that may be permitted by the President under the authority conferred upon him by said section 13: Provided, however, That any accumulating or withholding by any farmer or gardener, cooperative association of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, or any other person, of the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him shall not be deemed to be hoarding within the meaning of this act.

SEC. 7. That whenever any necessaries shall be hoarded as defined in section 6 they shall be liable to be proceeded against in any district court of the United States within the district where the same are found and seized by a process of libel for condemnation, and if such necessaries shall be adjudged to be hoarded they shall be disposed of by sale in such manner as to provide the most equitable distribution thereof as the court may direct, and the proceeds thereof, less the legal costs and charges, shall be paid to the party entitled thereto. The proceedings of such libel cases shall conform as near as may be to the proceedings in admiralty, except that either party may demand trial by jury of any issue of fact joined in any such case, and all such proceedings shall be at the suit of and in the name of the United States. It shall be the duty of the United States attorney for the proper district to institute and prosecute any such action upon presentation to him of satisfactory evidence to sustain the same.

SEC. 8. That any person who willfully destroys any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

SEC. 9. That any person who conspires, combines, agrees, or arranges with any other person (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict the distribution of any necessaries; (d) to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $10,000 or be imprisoned for not more than two years, or both.

SEC. 10. That the President is authorized, from time to time, to requisition foods, feeds, fuels, and other supplies necessary to the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or any other public use connected with the common defense, and to requisition, or otherwise provide, storage facilities for such supplies; and he shall ascertain and pay a just compensation therefor. If the compensation so determined be not satisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just compensation for such necessaries or storage space, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred on the United States district courts to hear and determine all such controversies: Provided, That nothing in this section, or in the section that follows, shall be construed to require any natural person to furnish to the Government any necessaries held by him and reasonably required for consumption or use by himself and dependents, nor shall any person, firm, corporation, or association be required to furnish to the Government any seed necessary for the seeding of land owned, leased, or cultivated by them.

SEC. 11. That the President is authorized from time to time to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell for cash at reasonable prices, wheat, flour, meal, beans, and potatoes: Provided, That if any minimum price shall have been theretofore fixed, pursuant to the provisions of section 14 of this act, then the price paid for any such articles so purchased shall not be less than such minimum price. Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the disposal by the United States of necessaries under this section may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 12. That whenever the President shall find it necessary to secure an adequate supply of necessaries for the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or for any other public use connected with the common defense, he is authorized to requisition and take over, for use or operation by the Government, any factory, packing house, oil pipe line, mine, or other plant, or any part thereof, in or through which any necessaries are or may be manufactured, produced, prepared, or mined, and to operate the same. Whenever the President shall determine that the further use or operation by the Government of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof, is not essential for the national security or defense, the same shall be restored to the person entitled to the possession thereof. The United States shall make just compensation, to be determined by the President, for the taking over, use, occupation, and operation by the Government of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof. If the compensation so determined be unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation, in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code. The President is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he may deem essential for carrying out the purposes of this section, including the operation of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof, the purchase, sale, or other disposition of articles used, manufactured, produced, prepared, or mined therein, and the employment, control, and compensation of employees. Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the use or operation of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof, may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for the purpose of the continued use or operation of any such factory, mine, or plant, or part thereof, and the accounts of each such factory, mine, plant, or part thereof, shall be kept separate and distinct. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 13. That whenever the President finds it essential in order to prevent undue enhancement, depression, or fluctuation of prices of, or in order to prevent injurious speculation in, or in order to prevent unjust market manipulation or unfair and misleading market quotations of the prices of necessaries, hereafter in this section called evil practices, he is authorized to prescribe such regulations governing, or may either wholly or partly prohibit, operations, practices, and transactions at, on, in, or under the rules of any exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business as he may find essential in order to prevent, correct, or remove such evil practices. Such regulations may require all persons coming within their provisions to keep such records and statements of account, and may require such persons to make such returns, verified under oath or otherwise, as will fully and correctly disclose all transactions at, in, or on, or under the rules of any such exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business, including the making, execution, settlement, and fulfillment thereof. He may also require all persons acting in the capacity of a clearing house, clearing association, or similar institution, for the purpose of clearing, settling, or adjusting transactions at, in, or on, or under the rules of any such exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business, to keep such records and to make such returns as will fully and correctly disclose all facts in their possession relating to such transactions, and he may appoint agents to conduct the invetigations necessary to enforce the provisions of this section and all rules and regulations made by him in pursuance thereof, and may fix and pay the compensation of such agents. Any person who willfully violates any regulation made pursuant to this section, or who knowingly engages in any operation, practice, or transaction prohibited pursuant to this section, or who willfully aids or abets any such violation or any such prohibited operation, practice, or transaction, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than four years, or both.

SEC. 14. That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat, produced within the United States, shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized, from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit. The President shall thereupon fix such guaranteed price for each of the official grain standards for wheat as established under the United States grain standards act, approved August 11, 1916. The President shall from time to time establish and promulgate such regulations as he shall deem wise in connection with such guaranteed prices, and in particular governing conditions of delivery and payment, and differences in price for the several standard grades in the principal primary markets of the United States, adopting No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent at the principal interior primary markets as the basis. Thereupon the Government of the United States hereby guarantees every producer of wheat produced within the United States that, upon compliance by him with the regulations prescribed, he shall receive for any wheat produced in reliance upon this guarantee within the period, not exceeding 18 months, prescribed in the notice, a price not less than the guaranteed price therefor as fixed pursuant to this section. In such regulations the President shall prescribe the terms and conditions upon which any such producer shall be entitled to the benefits of such guaranty. The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat for the crop of 1918 shall be based upon No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent at not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary markets. This guaranty shall not be dependent upon the action of the President under the first part of this section, but is hereby made absolute and shall be binding until May 1, 1919. When the President finds that the importation into the United States of any wheat produced outside of the United States materially enhances or is likely materially to enhance the liabilities of the United States under guaranties of prices therefor made pursuant to this section, and ascertains what rate of duty, added to the then existing rate of duty on wheat and to the value of wheat at the time of importation, would be sufficient to bring the price thereof at which imported up to the price fixed therefor pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this section, he shall proclaim such facts, and thereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon wheat when imported, in addition to the then existing rate of duty, the rate of duty so ascertained; but in no case shall any such rate of duty be fixed at an amount which will effect a reduction of the rate of duty upon wheat under any then existing tariff law of the United States. For the purpose of making any guaranteed price effective under this section, or whenever he deems it essential in order to protect the Government of the United States against material enhancement of its liabilities arising out of any guaranty under this section, the President is authorized also, in his discretion, to purchase any wheat for which a guaranteed price shall be fixed under this section, and to hold, transport, or store it, or to sell, dispose of, and deliver the same to any citizen of the United States or to any Government engaged in war with any country with which the Government of the United States is or may be at war or to use the same as supplies for any department or agency of the Government of the United States. Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the sale or disposal of wheat under this section may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 15. That from and after 30 days from the date of the approval of this act no foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds shall be used in the production of distilled spirits for beverage purposes: Provided, That under such rules, regulations, and bonds as the President may prescribe such materials may be used in the production of distilled spirits exclusively for other than beverage purposes, or for the fortification of pure sweet wines as defined by the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916. Nor shall there be imported into the United States any distilled spirits. Whenever the President shall find that limitation, regulation, or prohibition of the use of foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes, or that reduction of the alcoholic content of any such malt or vinous liquor, is essential, in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food, or that the national security and defense will be subserved thereby, he is authorized, from time to time, to prescribe and give public notice of the extent of the limitation, regulation, prohibition, or reduction so necessitated. Whenever such notice shall have been given and shall remain unrevoked no person shall, after a reasonable time prescribed in such notice, use any foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors, or import any such liquors except under license issued by the President and in compliance with rules and regulations determined by him governing the production and importation of such liquors and the alcoholic content thereof. Any person who willfully violates the provisions of this section, or who shall use any foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors, or who shall import any such liquors, without first obtaining a license so to do when a license is required under this section, or who shall violate any rule or regulation made under this section, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both: Provided further, That nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the licensing of the manufacture of vinous or malt liquors in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or any civil subdivision thereof, where the manufacture of such vinous or malt liquor is prohibited.

SEC. 16. That the President is authorized and directed to commandeer any or all distilled spirits in bond or in stock at the date of the approval of this act for redistillation, in so far as such redistillation may be necessary to meet the requirements of the Government in the manufacture of munitions and other military and hospital supplies, or in so far as such redistillation would dispense with the necessity of utilizing products and materials suitable for foods and feeds in the future manufacture of distilled spirits for the purposes herein enumerated. The President shall determine and pay a just compensation for the distilled spirits so commandeered; and if the compensation so determined be not satisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation for such spirits, in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

SEC. 17. That every person who willfully assaults, resists, impedes, or interferes with any officer, employee, or agent of the United States in the execution of any duty authorized to be performed by or pursuant to this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not exceeding $1,000 or be imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.

SEC. 18. That the sum of $2,500,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available until June 30, 1918, for the payment of such rent, the expense, including postage, of such printing and publications, the purchase of such material and equipment, and the employment of such persons and means, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, as the President may deem essential.

SEC. 19. That for the purposes of this act the sum of $150,000,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be available during the time this act is in effect: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the purposes described in the preceding section: Provided further, That itemized statements covering all purchases and disbursements under this and the preceding section shall be filed with the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives on or before the 25th day of each month after the taking effect of this act, covering the business of the preceding month, and said statements shall be subject to public inspection.

SEC. 20. That the employment of any person under the provisions of this act shall not exempt any such person from military service under the provisions of the selective-draft law approved May 18, 1917.

SEC. 21. The President shall cause a detailed report to be made to the Congress on the 1st day of January each year of all proceedings had under this act during the year preceding. Such report shall, in addition to other matters, contain an account of all persons appointed or employed, the salary or compensation paid or allowed each, the aggregate amount of the different kinds of property purchased or requisitioned, the use and disposition made of such property, and a statement of all receipts, payments, and expenditures, together with a statement showing the general character and estimated value of all property then on hand, and the aggregate amount and character of all claims against the United States growing out of this act.

SEC. 22. That if any clause, sentence, paragraph, or part of this act shall for any reason be adjudged by any court of competent jurisdiction to be invalid, such judgment shall not affect, impair, or invalidate the remainder thereof, but shall be confined in its operation to the clause, sentence, paragraph, or part thereof directly involved in the controversy in which such judgment shall have been rendered.

SEC. 23. That words used in this act shall be construed to import the plural or the singular, as the case demands. The word "person," wherever used in this act, shall include individuals, partnerships, associations, and corporations. When construing and enforcing the provisions of this act, the act, omission, or failure of any official, agent, or other person acting for or employed by any partnership, association, or corporation within the scope of his employment or office shall, in every case, also be deemed the act, omission, or failure of such partnership, association, or corporation as well as that of the person.

SEC. 24. That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect when the existing state of war between the United States and Germany shall have terminated, and the fact and date of such termination shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President; but the termination of this act shall not affect any act done, or any right or obligation accruing or accrued, or any suit or proceeding had or commenced in any civil case before the said termination pursuant to this act; but all rights and liabilities under this act arising before its termination shall continue and may be enforced in the same manner as if the act had not terminated. Any offense committed and all penalties, forfeitures, or liabilities incurred prior to such termination may be prosecuted or punished in the same manner and with the same effect as if this act had not been terminated.

SEC. 25. That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, whenever and wherever in his judgment necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, to fix the price of coal and coke, wherever and whenever sold, either by producer or dealer, to establish rules for the regulation of and to regulate the method of production, sale, shipment, distribution, apportionment, or storage thereof among dealers and consumers, domestic or foreign; said authority and power may be exercised by him in each case through the agency of the Federal Trade Commission during the war or for such part of said time as in his judgment may be necessary.

That if, in the opinion of the President, any such producer or dealer fails or neglects to conform to such prices or regulations, or to conduct his business efficiently under the regulations and control of the President as aforesaid, or conducts it in a manner prejudicial to the public interest, then the President is hereby authorized and empowered in every such case to requisition and take over the plant, business, and all appurtenances thereof belonging to such producer or dealer as a going concern, and to operate or cause the same to be operated in such manner and through such agency as he may direct during the period of the war or for such part of said time as in his judgment may be necessary.

That any producer or dealer whose plant, business, and appurtenances shall have been requisitioned or taken over by the President shall be paid a just compensation for the use thereof during the period that the same may be requisitioned or taken over as aforesaid, which compensation the President shall fix or cause to be fixed by the Federal Trade Commission.

That if the prices so fixed, or if, in the case of the taking over or requisitioning of the mines or business of any such producer or dealer, the compensation therefor as determined by the provisions of this act be not satisfactory to the person or persons entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined, and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code.

While operating or causing to be operated any such plants or business, the President is authorized to prescribe such regulations as he may deem essential for the employment, control, and compensation of the employees necessary to conduct the same.

Or if the President of the United States shall be of the opinion that he can thereby better provide for the common defense, and whenever, in his judgment, it shall be necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, then he is hereby authorized and empowered to require any or all producers of coal and coke, either in any special area or in any special coal fields, or in the entire United States, to sell their products only to the United States through an agency to be designated by the President, such agency to regulate the resale of such coal and coke, and the prices thereof, and to establish rules for the regulation of and to regulate the methods of production, shipment, distribution, apportionment, or storage thereof among dealers and consumers, domestic or foreign, and to make payment of the purchase price thereof to the producers thereof, or to the person or persons legally entitled to said payment.

That within 15 days after notice from the agency so designated to any producer of coal and coke that his, or its, output is to be so purchased by the United States as hereinbefore described, such producer shall cease shipments of said product upon his own account and shall transmit to such agency all orders received and unfilled or partially unfilled, showing the exact extent to which shipments have been made thereon, and thereafter all shipments shall be made only on authority of the agency designated by the President, and thereafter no such producer shall sell any of said products except to the United States through such agency, and the said agency alone is hereby authorized and empowered to purchase during the continuance of the requirement the output of such producers.

That the prices to be paid for such products so purchased shall be based upon a fair and just profit over and above the cost of production, including proper maintenance and depletion charges, the reasonableness of such profits and cost of production to be determined by the Federal Trade Commission, and if the prices fixed by the said commission of any such product purchased by the United States as hereinbefore described be unsatisfactory to the person or persons entitled to receive the same, such person or persons shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as added to said 75 per cent will make up such amount as will be just compensation in the manner provided by section 24, paragraph 20 and section 145 of the Judicial Code. All such products so sold to the United States shall be sold by the United States at such uniform prices, quality considered, as may be practicable and as may be determined by said agency to be just and fair.

Any moneys received by the United States for the sale of any such coal and coke may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any moneys not so used shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

That when directed by the President, the Federal Trade Commission is hereby required to proceed to make full inquiry, giving such notice as it may deem practicable, into the cost of producing under reasonably efficient management at the various places of production the following commodities, to wit: Coal and coke.

The books, correspondence, records, and papers in any way referring to transactions of any kind relating to the mining, production, sale, or distribution of all mine operators or other persons whose coal and coke have or may become subject to this section, and the books, correspondence, records, and papers of any person applying for the purchase of coal and coke from the United States shall at all times be subject to inspection by the said agency, and such person or persons shall promptly furnish said agency any data or information relating to the business of such person or persons which said agency may call for, and said agency is hereby authorized to procure the information in reference to the business of such coal-mine operators and producers of coke and customers therefor in the manner provided for in sections 6 and 9 of the act of Congress approved September 26, 1914, entitled "An act to create a Federal Trade Commission, to define its powers and duties, and for other purposes," and said agency is hereby authorized and empowered to exercise all the powers granted to the Federal Trade Commission by said act for the carrying out of the purposes of this section.

Having completed its inquiry respecting any commodity in any locality it shall, if the President has decided to fix the prices at which any such commodity shall be sold by producers and dealers generally, fix and publish maximum prices for both producers of and dealers in any such commodity, which maximum prices shall be observed by all producers and dealers until further action thereon is taken by the commission.

In fixing maximum prices for producers the commission shall allow the cost of production, including the expense of operation, maintenance, depreciation, and depletion, and shall add thereto a just and reasonable profit.

In fixing such prices for dealers, the commission shall allow the cost to the dealer and shall add thereto a just and reasonable sum for his profit in the transaction.

The maximum prices so fixed and published shall not be construed as invalidating any contract in which prices are fixed, made in good faith, prior to the establishment and publication of maximum prices by the commission.

Whoever shall, with knowledge that the prices of any such commodity have been fixed as herein provided, ask, demand, or receive a higher price or whoever shall, with knowledge that the regulations have been prescribed as herein provided, violate or refuse to conform to any of the same, shall, upon conviction, be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both. Each independent transaction shall constitute a separate offense.

Nothing in this section shall be construed as restricting or modifying in any manner the right the Government of the United States may have in its own behalf or in behalf of any other Government at war with Germany to purchase, requisition, or take over any such commodities for the equipment, maintenance, or support or armed forces at any price or upon any terms that may be agreed upon or otherwise lawfully determined.

SEC. 26. That any person carrying on or employed in commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, or with or in the Territories or other possessions of the United States in any article suitable for human food, fuel, or other necessaries of life, who, either in his individual capacity or as an officer, agent, or employee of a corporation or member of a partnership carrying on or employed in such trade, shall store, acquire, or hold, or who shall destroy or make away with any such article for the purpose of limiting the supply thereof to the public or affecting the market price thereof in such commerce, whether temporarily or otherwise, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and, upon conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both: Provided, That any storing or holding by any farmer, gardener, or other person of the products of any farm, garden, or other land cultivated by him shall not be deemed to be a storing or holding within the meaning of this act: Provided further, That farmers and fruit growers, cooperative and other exchanges, or societies of a similar character shall not be included within the provisions of this section: Provided further, That this section shall not be construed to prohibit the holding or accumulating of any such article by any such person in a quantity not in excess of the reasonable requirements of his business for a reasonable time or in a quantity reasonably required to furnish said articles produced in surplus quantities seasonally throughout the period of scant or no production. Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to repeal the act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890, commonly known as the Sherman Antitrust Act.

SEC. 27. That the President is authorized to procure, or aid in procuring, such stock of nitrate of soda as he may determine to be necessary, and find available, for increasing agricultural production during the calendar years 1917–18, and to dispose of the same for cash at cost, including all expenses connected therewith. For carrying out the purposes of this section, there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, available immediately and until expended, the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, and the President is authorized to make such regulations, and to use such means and agencies of the Government as, in his discretion, he may deem best. The proceeds arising from the disposition of the nitrate of soda shall go into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in bill form in parallel columns showing the bill as agreed to by the conferees and the bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is what was practically done by the committee itself in the print that was made.

Mr. NORRIS. There was also the House part of it, all in one print.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have no objection to the Senator's request if it does not involve delay.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not in favor of any delay, but I take it the Senator does not expect to conclude the debate and reach a vote on the conference report to-day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope so, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. My own idea is that the debate will not be concluded to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. NORRIS subsequently said: Mr. President, I have just been talking with the printing clerk of the Senate, who would have to carry out the order for printing the food bill in parallel columns, which was made at my request and some other Senators. I find that it is almost an impossibility to carry out that order, inasmuch as the conference agreement is composed of some matters which were put in by the other House, some of which were put in by the Senate, others which were put in by the conferees, and some portions stricken out by the Senate, and then restored by the conferees. So it would be a very difficult matter to carry out the order. On an examination of the committee print now before us I have reached the conclusion that it shows the bill in its present condition better than would a parallel-column print. I therefore ask that the order be rescinded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the order for the printing of the food-control bill, so-called, in parallel columns be rescinded. Is there objection? There being no objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, it is understood that the order which was granted at my request will stand?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was a separate order, the Chair will say to the Senator from Connecticut, and it stands.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense, by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the printing, with illustrations, of 100,000 copies of the speech of Hon. FREDERICK C. HICKS, of New York, delivered in the House of Representatives on June 14, 1917, on the "Flag of the United States," etc., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution authorizing the Clerk, in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, to number the sections following section 4 of the bill in consecutive numerical order, etc., in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Cupertino, Cal., praying for the establishment of a moral zone around the concentration camps of the Army, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask to have printed in the RECORD some resolutions adopted by the National Editorial Association favoring zone postage rates for second-class matter and for the governmental control through the instrumentality of the Trade Commission of print-paper prices and distribution, and also relating to the special newspaper-profits tax.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions addressed to Congress adopted by the National Editorial Association in convention at Minneapolis, Minn., July 9 to 12, 1917.

FAVORING "ZONE" POSTAGE RATES.

Whereas the members of the National Editorial Association are deeply interested in pending legislation before the Congress of the United States affecting rates of postage on second-class mail matter; and

Whereas it seems advisable to state the position of the country press on this important question: It is hereby

Resolved, That this association, as representative of the country press, hereby indorses the so-called zone system of rates on second-class mail matter and urges Congress to enact legislation based on this principle, with a charge of not exceeding 5 cents per pound for the farthest zone.

FOR TRADE COMMISSION CONTROL OF PRINT-PAPER PRICES AND DISTRIBUTION.

Whereas for the past 18 months there has been a determined and persistent effort on the part of the print-paper manufacturers and jobbers to create a panic market for print paper; and

Whereas for several months they succeeded in making the publishers believe that there was good and sufficient reasons for the extraordinary prices they were charging, but during the past seven or eight months it has been clearly demonstrated by the investigations of the Federal Trade Commission and by your legislative committee that there was and is no good reason for the large advances made, as the Trade Commission clearly demonstrated that there has been but a very slight increase in the cost of manufacture: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the National Editorial Association in convention assembled at Minneapolis calls upon Congress to pass legislation immediately that will give the Federal Trade Commission power to fix prices and operate the mills and distribute the print paper manufactured in the United States during the period of the present war, in accordance with the recommendations of the Trade Commission in its report to Congress; and further be it

Resolved, That arrangements be made with the Canadian Government so that the print paper manufactured in Canada and shipped into this country shall also be handled by the Trade Commission, in order that all the publishers of the United States may be provided with sufficient paper at a reasonable price.

SPECIAL NEWSPAPER-PROFITS TAX.

Whereas the National Editorial Association believes that it is the intention of Congress to levy taxes in a just and equitable manner; and

Whereas the newspapers of the country are taxed on their incomes, taxed as corporations, if they are corporations, and, if any of them make excess profits, are taxed on the excess profits, the same as every other business: Therefore be it

Resolved, That, in the judgment of the convention, it will be unjust to levy the special tax of 5 per cent on profits exceeding $4,000 earned by any newspaper, and we most earnestly urge Congress to remove this tax, which is in the bill as now before the United States Senate. We are willing to bear our just share of burdens for the conduct of the present war, but do not believe that there should be an additional tax placed upon us that is not placed upon other business.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I desire to have printed in the RECORD certain letters and telegrams from citizens of Tennessee in the nature of petitions.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMPHIS, TENN., July 27, 1917.

Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Section 304 of the revenue bill as it stands would work an injustice and hardship on every druggist and manufacturer of preparations containing grain alcohol.

We would request that you have the following omitted from the section (whether in the original condition, mixed, or combined with any other articles). This section is objectionable for a number of reasons:

In the first place, it is retroactive and will require a payment of the tax on goods already purchased and paid for and upon which the manufacturer has already in many cases fixed a resale price.

In the second place, almost every drug stock, wholesale and retail, has some articles that are unsalable or of very slow sale. If these contain even a trace of alcohol, the tax will apply also to them, thus adding an unwarranted tax to practically dead stock.

In the third place, when this additional tax has been removed, the article containing the alcohol on which the tax has been paid will come in competition with newly manufactured articles, upon which the additional tax does not have to be paid, and the result will be a loss of value.

In the fourth place, the tax is impractical of administration and can produce very little revenue to the Government; we all know that there are literally thousands of preparations in the drug business which contain all the way from a trace of alcohol to less than what might be considered a considerable amount. A large number of these preparations are in packages containing comparatively few ounces and in which the alcoholic content is very small. If the Government is to attempt to figure this alcoholic content to assess and collect tax upon it, the expense of determining and collecting the tax will leave little, if any, net revenue.

In the fifth place, the tax is discriminatory. The drug trade is already bearing more than its fair share of taxation and should not be burdened with this.

So will ask you to use your influence to have the parts above which are objectionable stricken from the bill, and very much oblige.

Yours, very truly,

VAN VLEET-MANSFIELD DRUG CO.,
Per W. G. BEST, Manager.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., August 1, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Senate bill No. 2660, introduced by Senator BROUSSARD, of Louisiana, corrects a very serious injustice to the medicine and drug trade which has been done by the Post Office Department ruling that ethyl alcohol is an intoxicating liquor, and which would mean that advertisements of medicines containing alcohol could not be mailed.

Senator BROUSSARD'S bill makes an exception of ethyl alcohol for governmental, scientific, medicinal, manufacturing, and industrial purposes, and would clear the matter up in a very satisfactory way.

I trust you will use your influence in the committee to report this bill favorably, as it is a matter of great importance to us and many of our friends in this State.

Thanking you in advance for your consideration, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

THE CHATTANOOGA MEDICINE CO.,
Z. C. PATTEN, Jr., President.

KNOXVILLE, TENN., July 24, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: As you know, the Senate Finance Committee reported in favor of a war tax of 1 cent each on out-of-town letters with no tax on drop letters and postal cards, which already pay a profit of 300 to 700 per cent.

We also understand that since the liquor legislation was passed in the Senate that the bill has been returned to the committee for the purpose of having them provide for a large revenue.

We want you to know that we loyally favor the 1-cent war tax on out-of-town letters, and hope you will support same.

We also ask you to oppose with all your might any war tax on drop letters and postals now paying a profit of over 300 to 700 per cent.

As you know, second-class mail matter is being distributed at an annual loss of over $80,000,000. Why not advance their rate enough to at once reduce that loss one-half and use this revenue for war purposes as long as needed and afterwards for the purpose of giving us 1-cent letter postage?

We understand certain Members of the Senate and House are going to make a vigorous fight for the legislation outlined above, and beg to request that you be one of those to lead in this fight.

Kindly let us hear from you, and oblige,

Very respectfully, yours,

WALTER E. AURIN.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., U. S. A., July 19, 1917.

Senator KENNETH D. MCKELLAR.
Care United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We have noticed with a great deal of interest your fight for economical and clean deal on the part of the various boards and committees having charge of the war situation.

We know that your hands are more than full and doubtless you are annoyed with many suggestions. On several occasions the writer has been asked to go down to Chickamauga Park and consult with some of the authorities there relative to handling certain conditions and situation here in Chattanooga. While at the park we have been wonderfully surprised to see the tremendous waste going on there daily in foodstuffs as well as other material.

It would pay the United States Government 100 per cent to have an honest inspector who would look after food economy in this camp, and we suppose that this is true, perhaps, in all other camps of this character. There is a daily waste at Chickamauga of 100 pounds of bread that is fed to the hogs being raised by people who buy slop from the camp. One party told us yesterday that he got daily perhaps 300 to 400 pounds, all too when flour is selling for from $13 to $14 per barrel, which is a little wasteful, especially in view of the fact that our Government is warning the people to economize in foodstuffs.

We do not know on what basis the contract was let for building the cantonment at Chickamauga Park. From the awful waste of material we would judge that it was on the percentage basis. Any wise contractor could have saved from one-third to one-half of the material used in this building. This would apply especially to the lumber and roofing material.

It might be unwise to take your time in mentioning these matters, but we have done so, seeing your interest in trying to influence the Government authorities to work these matters on an honest and economic basis.

A matter about which we are very much concerned is the coal situation. We kindly desire to state that Secretary of War Baker was exceedingly correct in his criticism of the Government authorities on that question of the coal operators covering their outrageous prices named by that conference.

These prices are more than 100 per cent in excess of what they were a few months ago. It is, of course, but natural to expect that coal prices, like everything else, would run up by war conditions, but the prices made by the war conference with the coal operators are almost prohibitive on the manufacturer, and one of the most unjust features of this price is the fact that they make but little difference between the high-grade coal to be used in domestic affairs and the low-grade coal that can be used in the manufacturing plants. Less than 12 months ago we made a contract for nut and slack coal at $1.40 delivered at our plant in Chattanooga. According to to-day's Government figures agreed upon with the coal operators this same coal would to-day cost us $4.05 per ton, and this is, indeed, about what it is costing us.

The coal operators of this section are simply gloating over the terms that they have made with the Government, and what a great majority of our working people and the poorer people are to do this winter for coal is a problem. Something ought to be done to correct these tremendous evils.

Respectfully,

TENNESSEE COFFIN & CASKET CO.,
T. C. BETTERTON,
Secretary and Manager.

NASHVILLE, TENN., August 1, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting of the Nashville Manufacturers' Association, held at the Commercial Club of Nashville, Wednesday, August 1, 1917, it was unanimously ordered that this association go on record with our Representative in Washington as being opposed to some features of the seeming proposed methods of taxing manufacturers, as are now being considered in the United States Senate.

This association in no way desires to appear in the attitude of shirking from a proper proportionate part of the tax burdens, and assures the Government its loyal allegiance in all of its efforts to bear the tremendous expense of bringing to an end the world's greatest war.

We feel that Congress is liable to impose the excess tax to some extent in an inequitable way. Smaller manufacturers, who have not enjoyed more than a normal profit and whose capitalization is conservatively low—without water—under the present proposed plan, it seems to us, will be taxed a heavier proportion than the larger manufacturers who have enjoyed large and extremely profitable contracts and who have large and excessive capitalization.

We are opposed to making the war tax retroactive and think that past business should not be taxed, which only means an additional burden on present business.

We are opposed to the Government undertaking to pay its war bills in too short a period of time. With the exception of some special classes of manufacture the regular run of factory profits will not be able to stand the pressure.

It appears to us at this time that our war expense will run as high as $25,000,000,000. Supposing this is the amount to be cared for, in our opinion our Government would subject most manufacturers to a great and severe loss and hardship to undertake to care for this amount in less time than 25 years.

We urge our representatives in Congress to use their best efforts to defeat any measure which, in the distribution of tax burdens, is not equitable to all classes of business, individuals, and to proper period of time.

Yours, very truly,

NASHVILLE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION,
L. G. ARCHER, Secretary-Manager.

EXCESS WAR TAX VERSUS THE SOUTHERN JOBBER.

KNOXVILLE, TENN., August 2, 1917.

Hon. KENNETH D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: If your honor pleases, we crave permission to plead for the defense of this cause, not according to the law, perhaps, for we know know it not, unless it be the old adage that all law is founded on equity, but rather from the actual facts as found by us in our business experience, which experience prompts us to say that in our opinion the proposed Senate Finance Committee bill regardinging income and excess profit is discriminating and inequitable in its application, extremely expensive in its assessment and collection, and so complex that the average layman will be compelled to call in a Treasury expert before he can figure it out correctly.

In order to put this properly before you as we see it, we are submitting herewith a hypothetical case (Exhibit A) showing the presumed tax return of an average southern jobber in our line under actual conditions, on which we beg to comment as follows:

The first item, 4 per cent direct tax on actual net income is easily understood and fair in its application, just, and equitable, as it plays no favorites and asks each man coming under its rulings to pay the same proportion of his earnings.

The second item, however, exemptions to be based upon average net earnings for the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, is, in our opinion, unjust and unfair, as it discriminates heavily against some and in favor of others. We will confine ourselves to our own line, as we know it best, and say to you frankly that the years 1911, 1912, 1913, and 1914 were the worst ever known in the dry goods business, when losses both by depreciation of merchandise and on bad accounts were at their highest, when best profits averaged only about 6 per cent to 7 per cent on capital invested, and we have it on good authority that many averaged less than 6 per cent, while many closed these years with actual net losses.

Now, while this was true of the dry goods jobbers, we are likewise informed that during these same years many manufacturers showed handsome earnings, as large, or larger, than they will this year, but by virtue of these good profits are now exempt and pay little or nothing on 1917 business. For illustration, refer again to Exhibit A and presume that our subject had realized an average net profit of $60,000 for the years 1911, 1912, and 1913 and you can readily see the small proportion of excessive-profit tax he would now pay.

To the contrary, had the Senate specified the years 1903, 1904, 1905, 1906, and 1907 as criterions, the situation would no doubt have been reversed and these same manufacturers have been taxed heavily while the dry goods jobbers would have been almost exempt.

Is this equitable and will it bring forth the immense sums that our country must have now, when she needs it most, and when each and every one must feel, act, and be one for all and all for one?

Why any exemption, as each and every individual, corporation, or firm should willingly and cheerfully give according to their respective means, or, if we must have some exempt basis, why not make it a lump sum, so much for each $1,000 of capital and surplus invested for the year 1917 and a certain fixed proportion of the net profits remaining as a direct tax, equal and alike to all?

We respectfully submit, therefore, this plan, no exemptions to anyone for any reason, and a direct tax, be it what it may, on all profits for the year 1917 as being more equitable, just, and desirable from every point of view also promising larger returns, and trust your honor will see fit to rule in our favor, assuring you that we as humble representatives of our Southland will cheerfully and willingly do our part.

With best regards, we are,

Yours, very truly,

DEAVER-KENNEDY CO.
G. E. BRADFORD.

THE CASEY-HEDGES CO.,
Chattanooga, Tenn., August 2, 1917.

Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Re war-revenue bill, may we venture to submit our views?

We believe the so-called "Jones amendment" is unsound in that it strikes at the cardinal virtues of prudently conducted business; that it penalizes the "savings fund" and forces a distribution that may be dissipated to the detriment of capital-stock value and interest of creditors. Surplus and undivided profits created through the refining process of income accounting would be doubly taxed by the Jones amendment. Surplus accumulation should be encouraged, as it stands in equal relation to ordinary forms of capital—both are income producing and productive of revenue whether in the hands of the corporation or turned over to the stockholders individually; more certain, however, of being prudently invested controlled as a mass left with the corporation. Again, values are abnormally high and surplus will be required to take care of probable future radical adjustments, and sound financing demands the surplus as a margin of safety.

We also are inclined to think that an arbitrary rate to determine excess profits would be more equitable than an average prewar basis; the latter would appear in effect to be continued profits to the prosperous and continued losses to the losers. No fault can be found, we should think, with a uniform arbitrary rate. We are also of the opinion that a higher rate than 6 per cent should be used as a basis for excess-profits taxation, having in mind that business of manufacturing requires a higher rate for protection in financing its needs.

Yours, respectfully,

WM. W. GEROERE, Auditor.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., July 24, 1917.

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.:

The amendment to the war-revenue bill, section 304, page 27, lines 19 and 20, would impose an impossible task on wholesale druggists. When you consider there are thousands of items in a wholesale drug store containing alcohol in various strengths you will see it would be impossible to arrive at the proof gallons contained in our entire stock. The man who suggested this amendment evidently does not understand that he is imposing an impossibility on wholesale druggists and the drug trade generally. If it is possible to eliminate this amendment please do so.

FRITTS & WIEHL CO.

NASHVILLE, TENN., July 25, 1917.

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: We are writing this letter to you to protest against the enactment of the excess profits law as recommended by the Senate Finance Committee.

This is, without doubt, the most unfair measure to the average business man we have ever heard of. We are perfectly willing to pay taxes for the maintenance of the war, but in many cases with the excess profits tax, and the same profits being taxed again on the individual incomes of members of the firm, would take from 50 to 65 per cent of the income of such manufacturers. No more unjust or unfair measures, in our opinion, could be conceived than the one recommended by the Finance Committee of the Senate, and we are sure your good sense and your desire to see that the manufacturers in your State are treated fairly would prompt you to vigorously oppose this measure. In our opinion the only fair excess profits tax that can be levied would be a flat tax of 5 or 10 per cent on all net profits of merchants, manufacturers, and business men generally, without regard to what they have made in former years. The profit of 5 or 10 per cent of the net earnings of business would cause no hardship on anyone, would fall equally on all, and would raise vastly more revenue than anything yet proposed.

Yours, respectfully,

FLETCHER & WILSON COFFEE CO.

NASHVILLE, TENN., July 26, 1917.

Senator MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Excessive profits tax unfair and penalizes one's ingenuity. We realize Government's necessities and are willing to do our share, but tax should be equally distributed. Lawyers, doctors, farmers, in fact, all citizens, should participate. We earnestly protest against excessive profits tax as class legislation and urge the fairest plan of increasing rate on income tax.

NASHVILLE MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION,
By JAMES H. PARKES, President.

ROANE IRON CO.,
Chattanooga, Tenn., July 27, 1917.

Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It is not our habit to appeal to our representatives unnecessarily in regard to legislation, and we especially feel at this time that every effort should be made to assist them in the many problems they have to solve.

We know that the Government now needs a great deal of money, and we are back of it heart and soul, but our lawmakers should, above all, be fair in passing measures for obtaining revenue.

In the first place, the larger part of the money needed should not be raised by taxation. This war is not only for the benefit of the present generation but for those who come after us. For this reason the Government should issue as many bonds as can be sold to advantage and the business of the country should not be saddled with heavy taxation, which will be thrown upon them within a few years.

Secondly, we believe you should tax the corporations according to their earnings. If the individual pays taxes on the amount of his income, why not the corporations?

The Senate plan for taxing only "increased profits" is based on a faulty principle, which is neither logical or just. We know of officers in certain corporations who openly state they favor the Senate plan, because they would have to pay no taxes, inasmuch as their earnings for the years 1911, 1912, and 1913 were higher than 1917 will show. These corporations have fine earnings now, and yet they would bear little part of the expense of the war. On the other hand, corporations like our own have had over 10 years of continuous depression. Our concern gives a living to over 5,000 people, and for 25 years the stockholders have received less than 4 per cent annually on their investment, and we ran our plant for over two years at an actual loss of several thousand dollars.

Owing to the present demand for iron we are now making money, but the larger part of it is going into improvements, which have been needed for the past 20 years.

For example, contrast our earnings, roughly estimated, with a concern we know of with the same capita. invested.

	Our earnings.	Their earnings.
1911, 1912, 1913	$50,000	$750,000
1917	500,000	250,000
	550,000	1,000,000
Our taxes (possibly)	125,000	Nothing.

We are going to cheerfully pay our part of any tax, but such taxation should be evenly distributed. A business that has been continuously prosperous should not escape taxes while industries that have run at a loss for many years pay practically everything.

We believe if you understand this situation you can have no other view than our own, and we earnestly ask that you give your support and influence to these ends.

Yours, very truly,

M. CHAMBERLAIN,
Secretary and Treasurer.

EXHIBIT A.

We will also presume that this jobber declared a dividend of 15 per cent, or $30,000; his taxes under the proposed Senate bill will show as follows:

	$80,000	At	P. ct. 4	$3,200

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We noticed in the press reports yesterday morning where the Finance Committee on revenue had written in the bill to take 15 per cent of surplus and undivided profits of corporations. We want to ask you if this is not a misprint, as it is so manifestly unjust that we do not believe any representative that has influence enough to be elected to Congress would use such judgment as this. We have corporations in this little town founded before the Civil War that have paid very small dividends and have turned most of their profits into surplus and increased their business—one concern capitalized at $40,000, with a surplus of $450, which represents an accumulation of 50 years; our own company organized 16 years ago, being a close corporation, has never paid a dividend but turned the profits back into the surplus to increase the business—as well as many real-estate sales turned into surplus account. We would like to ask if you gentlemen think it fair to take 15 per cent of a man's accumulation for 16 years in one case, and in many cases 50 years? If so, there will not be much money saved in the future.

Yours, most respectfully,

B. M. WEBB.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We wish to direct your attention to section 304 of the revenue bill, which has been referred to the Finance Committee and will be before the Senate in a short time.

This section, we think, is entirely unfair and unjust, and if enacted would work a very great hardship on manufacturers of medicines and drugs as well as wholesalers and retailers, and very little revenue would be received by the Government after the cost of obtaining this information has been deducted.

For instance, as explained to us this would necessitate every retail druggist of the United States making a complete inventory of every article in stock which contains any percentage of alcohol and a tax levied against the net amount of alcohol.

We ask your support and influence in defeating this section if possible.

Yours, very truly, HAMNER-BALLARD DRUG CO.,

KNOXVILLE, TENN., July 30, 1917.

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We are taking the liberty of addressing you on the Senate Finance Committee bill as drawn regarding income and excess profits tax.

We are perfectly willing and anxious to pay our part of war taxes of the United States at the present time. Not only is it our duty but it is our pleasure to help in every way we can. Still, at the same time, we feel it is unfair the way this bill has been drawn, and is going to be extremely injurious to a great many—especially southern concerns.

There are many concerns, manufacturers of advertised goods, which made enormous profits during the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, owing to cheap labor and low cost of materials, who will not make as much during 1916 and 1917 as in the three years before the war, as they did not advance their prices in proportion to the advances in labor and material. Hence these firms will be eliminated entirely from excess tax, although their net profits are still very large. Therefore we feel that a straight tax on all of the net profits of a fixed per cent would be much more equitable and at the same time bring in a larger income to the Government.

As we understand from press reports, the Government figures on excess profits will be in the neighborhood of $5,000,000,000, and from this amount they wish to raise about $800,000,000 on excess profits, which is nearly 16 per cent.

Now, this Senate bill as drawn, based on the poor years of 1911, 1912, and 1913, and figuring a profit of $50,000 for 1917 on a concern whose capital amounts to $200,000, the excess tax will be from $18,000 to $20,000, or nearly 40 per cent.

You and every other man familiar with conditions know that from 1907 until 1914 business in the South was very poor, and it was not a question of making money but a question of being able to stay in business at all. From 1910 until 1914 the majority of concerns in the South—especially in the wholesale dry goods and notion business—did not make interest on their capital. Other concerns in different lines may have fared a little better, but none made any money.

We are to-day buying merchandise that is costing us from 100 to 150 per cent more than it did during 1912 and 1913, and have made an additional profit on the advancing market, but if we are not going to be allowed to accumulate a good surplus we will be unable to stand the declines on our lines when the readjustment comes, which will come sooner or later; and if the concerns carrying stocks of merchandise are not allowed to protect themselves to some extent in that way they will be forced out of business after these declines come.

Will furthermore say that our excess profits are not in cash, but in high-price merchandise, which is likely to decline, also in unpaid accounts in the country, many of which we may be a long time collecting and some of which may never be collected.

The majority of concerns in the South are all operating under a small capital. Their capital stocks represent the exact amount of money in their business, and these small concerns will be hit for a larger part of this tax than any concerns in the country. The large concerns who have immense capitals with a great deal of watered stock, although they are making enormous profits, will be practically eliminated from this excess profits tax.

As above stated, we are willing and anxious to do our part, but we feel the way this excess profits tax has been drawn it will force the majority of concerns out of business—both the jobbers and manufacturers—while others who are equally as able to pay this tax as ourselves, or even more so, will be practically eliminated from paying their part of the same.

We assure you we will appreciate your kind consideration to this matter, and, thanking you in advance for the same, we are,

Yours, very truly,

COWAN-MCCLUNG CO.,

Senator K. D. MCKELLAR,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Please refer to section 304 of the revenue bill, which, in our opinion, is very objectionable from a number of standpoints.

In the first place, it is retroactive and will require a payment of the tax on goods already purchased and paid for, and upon which the manufacturer has already, in many cases, fixed a resale price.

In the second place, almost every drug stock, wholesale and retail, has some articles that are unsalable or of very slow sale. If these contain even a trace of alcohol, the tax will apply also to them, thus adding an unwarranted tax to practically dead stock.

In the third place, when this additional tax is removed the article containing alcohol on which the tax has been paid will come in competition with newly manufactured articles upon which the additional tax does not have to be paid and the result will be a loss of value.

In the fourth place, the tax is impractical of administration, and can produce very little net revenue to the Government. We all know that there are literally thousands of preparations in the drug business which contain all the way from a trace of alcohol to less than what might even be considered a considerable amount. A large number of these preparations are in packages containing comparatively few ounces and in which the alcoholic content is very small. If the Government is to attempt to figure this alcoholic content, to assess and collect a tax upon it, the expense of determining and collecting the tax will leave little, if any, net revenue.

In the fifth place, the tax is discriminatory. The drug trade is already bearing more than its fair share of taxation and should not be burdened with this.

We must respectfully and vigorously protest against this measure.

Yours, very truly,

THE HESSIG-ELLIS DRUG CO.,

BROWN COAL CO. (INC.),
Memphis, Tenn., July 26, 1917.

Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MCKELLAR: I sent you a telegram this morning, which I confirm, as follows:

"Proposed legislation giving Federal Trade Commission power to fix coal prices very unjust, unless equally applied on all commodities, and trust you will use all your efforts to combat its enactment into law."

I am moved to send you this telegram on account of the gross injustice it appears the Government is willing to inflict upon the coal trade; that is, in fixing the price of coal, or authorizing the Federal Trade Commission to fix the price of coal, and practically leaving all other commodities on a competitive basis as they have been heretofore.

Since the war began the price of coal has not advanced in anything like the same ratio as many other basic commodities, such as steel, iron, copper, cotton, cotton seed, wheat, corn, and most all other farm products. At our mines right now we are paying $2.40 per bushel for corn with which to feed our mules as against a price of 75 cents two years ago.

This year we have bought $9,000 worth of steel rails, $7,000 worth of copper wire, and have paid three times the normal price for both of these. A great deal of heavy machinery is used in the mining of coal, and we are paying from two to three and one-half times the normal price, not only for any new equipment we have to get but for any repairs that we have to have. We are now paying $1.92½ per keg for powder as against $1.12½ on our contract which expired last August.

If we are to have the sale price of our product fixed, which probably means reduced, then we are indeed in a sad plight when all the commodities we have to buy are permitted on a free market.

As you are well aware, there has not been a dollar profit in the coal-mining business up until last year for the past 10 years, and the price of coal during that time being entirely too low, the present price looks like, no doubt, high in comparison; but the difficulty is more largely in that the price was too low in former years instead of too high at the present time.

Yours, very truly, R. L. BROWN, President.

COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE,

The other queries contained in your letter have heretofore been answered.

GERMAN PROPAGANDA IN MEXICO.

Mr. SHERMAN. I submit the following communication, which came in my mail this morning marked "Bulletin of Mexican News Bureau, 613 Riggs Building, Washington, D. C.," which I ask to have printed in the RECORD. I do this in view of the press communication or news item in the Washington Post and other papers to-day announcing that a propaganda will be carried on for some time in this country as preparatory to the Carranza Government applying in due season to the United States for a loan, variously estimated at from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000. I wish to call attention to this first of the series, and I shall from time to time, as appropriate occasions appear, put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD other information showing the activities and the friendly interest of the Carranza Government in preserving peace and chasing out pro-German agents in Mexico.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Bulletin of Mexican News Bureau, 613 Riggs Building, Washington, D. C. Aug. 2, 1917.]

GERMAN PROPAGANDA IN MEXICO.

The fact that the Mexican Government is opposed to the carrying on of any pro-German propaganda in that country is demonstrated by some noteworthy occurrences. It recently came to the knowledge of the officials that a shipment of several hundred cases of arms and ammunition had been made to the port of Salina Cruz, on the Pacific side of the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, and consigned to certain private parties who were suspected of being engaged in pro-German intrigue in the State of Chiapas. The shipment was ordered to be seized, which was done immediately upon its arrival.

The local authorities of the city of Guadalajara recently became cognizant of a plan on the part of certain German agents in that city to hold a meeting or festival in one of the leading theaters for the purpose of "advancing the cause of the Hohenzollerns against the civilized nations of Europe," as the local newspapers phrased it. The authorities let it be understood that this project would be regarded unfavorably, whereupon the promoters of the movement changed the announced purpose and character of the meeting to one for the benefit of the poor children of the city.

The recent strike of workingmen in the Tampico oil fields which is claimed by a portion of the foreign press to have been instigated by German sympathizers or agents, but of which there is no proof and little probability, was settled by the State authorities and normal conditions promptly restored.

Several months ago the authorities of Mexico City arrested the managers of a theater for proposing to give moving pictures purporting to illustrate the German side of the campaign in Europe, but which were declared after inspection by the officials to be "fakes," but at the same time permission was given to the exhibition of films taken by English photographers and giving accurate representations of the Battle of the Somme. These facts are cited in order to prove that no encouragement is held out in official quarters in support of any movement against absolute neutrality.

WAR REVENUE.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I desire to have placed in the RECORD without reading some discussion by the Atlanta (Ga.) Merchants and Manufacturers' Association in regard to the war revenue bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ATLANTA MERCHANTS AND MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION,
OFFICE OF SECRETARY,
Atlanta, Ga., August 2, 1917.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
Finance Committee, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a special meeting of the board of directors of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association of Atlanta, representing the jobbing and manufacturing interests of this city, held for the purpose of considering the proposed war-revenue bill, known as H. R. 4280, the undersigned were appointed a committee to present for your consideration the views of the members of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association regarding certain features of said bill.

The committee was instructed to exercise its discretion as to whether it would go to Washington and seek an audience with you at which to present these views, or offer them in the form of a simple statement over their signatures. We decided that in the interest of economy both in money and time to adopt the latter medium.

We will endeavor to confine ourselves to the more salient features of the bill, having particular regard to those provisions which, in our judgment, are calculated to work grievous inequalities for the great majority of the merchants of our section; to impair their productive powers, if not actually to threaten their existence. Let us say here that the members of this organization are thoroughly alive not only to the needs of the Government but to the great difficulty of levying such a tax as is contemplated so as to make it bear equally upon every class of business; and there is not the slightest desire on the part of any member to avoid his fair share of the responsibility; but they believe that the bill as it now stands, owing to certain conditions prevailing in the South for several years prior to the war, is not only discriminatory in its effect but places a burden upon the mercantile houses of this section that only the strongest can survive, and that the ultimate result of its operation will be to deprive the Government of, rather than provide it with, revenue.

We wish, therefore, on behalf of the members of this association to enter our very earnest protest against—

First. The arbitrary and inflexible basis upon which the maximum normal profit is fixed and from which point the supertax begins.

Second. The Jones amendment, imposing an extra tax of 15 per cent on 80 per cent of the amount of undistributed net income.

We would point out that the years 1911, 1912, and 1913, the average of which is to be the measure of a normal year—except where the amount so produced is less than 6 per cent on the invested capital, when a minimum of 6 per cent is to be allowed as the standard of normal earnings—were three notoriously lean years in our section of the country, and their average would reflect in a majority of cases no more than 50 per cent of a normal year. In fact, there has not been any such thing as a normal year in our section since the panic of 1907. Business was just beginning to reach for normal results in 1914, when the war broke out, and the situation was changed in a day from one of great promise of prosperity to one of extreme depression and small net earnings.

We therefore submit that the basis should be either fixed by selecting and averaging the three years immediately prior to 1907, or by allowing the taxpayer to choose three years out of the five prewar years of 1909 to 1913, inclusive, from which to arrive at a just basis.

Where under the foregoing plan the earnings fall below a fair minimum of percentage of earnings to invested capital, in fixing a permissible minimum from which to superimpose the "war excess profits" taxation the law should discriminate between mercantile houses and large industrial corporations; between the small close corporations whose earnings are as much a matter of personal service and enterprise on the part of its members as they are of capital invested; between those whose administrators draw moderate salaries and whose earnings are largely absorbed by salaries; between those whose capital is real and those whose stock is partly represented by good will or other assumed value. In each of such former cases a minimum normal earning of 10 per cent on capital and surplus should be allowed before the supertax begins.

In the judgment of the members of this association the Jones amendment is indefensible, either as an economic measure or from a standpoint of fairness to a class of taxpayers on whose producing powers the Government is so largely depending and who as a body are desirous of meeting their full responsibilities. We entertain the firm belief that for the sake of the stability and unimpaired earning capacity of the mercantile concerns of the country, if the Government assumed to regulate such matters at all, it should be to prohibit such concerns from paying out, in dividends, exceeding 50 per cent of its net earnings for any fiscal period during the war rather than encourage excessive dividends from profits which are, in part at least, unquestionably fictitious or "paper" profits.

It is undeniably true that the average jobber and manufacturer is carrying the largest stocks, both in quantity and value, he has ever before been called upon to carry. This is not of his own choosing, but grew out of the exigencies of rising prices and competition. These stocks are owned at pinnacle prices. He has had to assume larger risks in extending credits than ever before in supplying his customers with no more than their usual requirements in quantity. This has served to correspondingly increase his receivables. By the measure of the amount of increased stocks and the amount of increased receivables the average jobber and manufacturer has increased his own liabilities. It will therefore appear to you quite plain that the amounts withdrawn in the payment of reasonable dividends to stockholders and to meet the demands of the Government will greatly strain the best-fortified concerns, and we capitally fear will prove embarrassing to others not so fortunately situated. To place an extra war tax of 15 per cent upon undivided profits (granting that 50 per cent of such profits were applied to dividends and the payments of the Federal taxes) would, in our judgment, cost the Government more in impaired productive power than the tax thus derived would amount to, and we trust to the wisdom and prudent forethought of our lawmakers to see that this amendment is defeated.

In conclusion, we wish to say, on behalf of every member of our organization, that we fully appreciate the unprecedented magnitude of the task with which our Representatives in Congress are confronted, but we beg leave to remind you that in a small sphere we shall have a duty to perform and a privilege to exercise in meeting whatever demands are laid upon us, and we want to feel not only that our share has been as equitably assessed as the exigencies of the situation allowed, but that the interests our organization represents may "meet with unimpaired strength the duty of enlarged production, extensive developments for national defense, and find proper opportunity for fortification for the commercial struggle of peace while remaining unimpaired as a revenue producer, capable of meeting extraordinary demands for financial contribution."

TERRITORIAL ADJUSTMENT IN EUROPE.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, many of the newspapers of the country have been in an intelligent and patriotic way setting forth the rights of our Republic in the great contest now going on in Europe. Among the newspapers that have been writing some very strong editorials on that and cognate subjects is the Washington Post. I present an editorial appearing in the columns of that paper, which I should like to have read and printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reading of the editorial? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

"SAFE FOR DEMOCRACY."

There has been much discussion in Europe as to the territorial adjustment that would make a satisfactory basis for permanent peace. The allies have made it plain that they stand for the complete restoration of Belgium. Former Premier Asquith has recently reiterated that Great Britain is in complete sympathy with the aim of France to force the restoration of Alsace-Lorraine.

In refraining from making any political alliances with the allies the United States has followed historic tradition. Most Americans of vision realize, however, that America's stake in the war is quite as big as that of any of the nations on whose side this country is fighting. America is being made safe from a future direct attack by the German Government. That such an attack would be made if Germany should become a world conqueror is shown by the records of German intrigue in the United States.

Germany's spy system covered, and perhaps still covers, every State in the Union. It is especially significant that Capt. Boy-Ed, the former naval attaché in the United States, should now be at the head of the German intelligence bureau.

The primary interest of the United States in the war is to make this country safe from any possible aggression of German autocracy, drunk with its belief in its own power. With the territorial aims of the allies, this country can have no interest except where they bear upon the future safety of democracy.

A recurrence of war after the world has been so shaken by the present catastrophe would be disastrous to America, as it would be to the smaller democracies. It is in this light that any territorial aims of the allies or the central powers must be viewed in America.

Fortunately, this country has not committed itself to any principle of settlement except that implied in the statement which reverberates through the civilized nations of the world, "The world must be made safe for democracy."

Well may the American people pour forth their blood and treasure in fighting for the safety of themselves and the generations of Americans yet to come!

The frontier of America is where the flag flies in the Pershing expedition in France. It is better that the fight should be waged and won there now than that it should be waged on American soil later on.

Talk of peace from Germany will deceive no patriotic American. It will not serve its shrewd purpose in delaying the training and equipment of a large force of American troops.

When the German people reform their Government and prove that militarism has given way to the free thought and expression of the people who henceforth will run their own nation, then will the world have assurance of safety. But so long as mad rulers continue in unlimited power no democracy will be safe.

When the time comes to consider peace terms American representatives at the council table need ask themselves but one question, "Do these terms make the world permanently safe for democracy?"

SENATOR GALLINGER AND THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. WEEKS. I ask to have printed in the RECORD an editorial taken from the Marine Journal of Saturday, July 14.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A MAN WHO WAS RIGHT.

Senator GALLINGER has left Washington for a needed rest at home, and this marks a proper occasion to say that if ever a public man found every argument and warning absolutely verified in the result this distinction belongs to the New Hampshire Senator, the senior leader of his party in the Upper Chamber at the National Capitol.

First as lieutenant to the lamented Senator Frye, of Maine, and then as foremost in the fight, Senator GALLINGER has emphasized for many years the need of a large American merchant shipping in peace and war. It is a matter of history how difficult it was to make this heard and realized by the Senators and Representatives of the solid South and the Mississippi Valley. But Senator GALLINGER, undiscouraged, pressed on and on, and was able to command entire respect and increasing support, even from his political and sectional antagonists. However, the careful measures which he proposed unfortunately failed to command the few votes requisite for a majority in both Senate and House of Representatives at the same time, and therefore the country met the shock of this great war fearfully unprepared in one department of the national defense.

That war, however, has brought a wonderful awakening. It must be a matter of amusement and satisfaction to Senator GALLINGER to observe how frequently the facts and figures of his arguments have been iterated and reiterated since the war began by President Wilson, Secretary McAdoo, and other leaders of the other side, which was so long indifferent to the truth about our merchant shipping. In fact, if there was such a thing as copyright of public utterances, the New Hampshire Senator might claim most of what is valid and convincing in recent Democratic shipping reports and speeches as his own.

If the bills which Senator GALLINGER framed and advocated had prevailed, the war would have found the United States with well-established steamship lines of large, fast ships to South America, the Orient, and other quarters of the world, officered by American citizens, manned by capable crews, and constituted a naval reserve of incalculable value to the United States in this emergency. There would have been auxiliary cruisers, transports, and supply ships of a kind for which fabulous prices must now be paid. There would have been more and greater shipyards to produce new vessels.

And the maximum appropriation called for by these bills which Senator GALLINGER championed were three or four million dollars a year. It is safe to say that every business day that passes sees three or four million dollars now spent by the United States for maritime preparation that would not have had to be spent at all if Senator GALLINGER'S policies had been adopted. Where he asked for a million, the United States is now disbursing a hundred million in the most gigantic subsidies that were ever dreamed of by mortal men, for materials, labor, and supplies have so enormously advanced, and haste makes waste inevitable.

We shall get a great merchant marine by the war plan, but it will prove to have cost incalculably more than if the Gallinger plan, which the South and West opposed, had become, 10 years ago, the plan of the American people.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON THE CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

Mr. OVERMAN. From the Committee on Rules I report back adversely the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 25) providing for the appointment of a joint committee to be known as the joint committee on the conduct of the war, and I submit a report (No. 102) thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be placed on the calendar.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for the third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

FOREIGN VESSELS IN COASTWISE TRADE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I introduce a bill, and I desire to state that I do not approve of the policy involved in the bill as a permanent one, but under existing circumstances I am inclined to think that such a measure as is embodied ought to be approved. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate concur in the resolution of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 1, 2, 5, 10, 11, 12, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 20, 21, 24, 25, 26, 29, 31, 32, 33, 35, and 38.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 3, 7, 8, 9, 13, 19, 23, 28, and 39, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the Senate amendment insert the following:

"It shall be the duty of any person, when requested by the Secretary of Agriculture, or any agent acting under his instructions, to answer correctly, to the best of his knowledge, under oath or otherwise, all questions touching his knowledge of any matter authorized to be investigated under this section, or to produce all books, letters, papers, or documents in his possession, or under his control, relating to such matter. Any person who shall, within a reasonable time to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture, not exceeding 30 days from the date of the receipt of the request, willfully fail or refuse to answer such questions or to produce such books, letters, papers, or documents, or who shall willfully give any answer that is false or misleading, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 6: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 6, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter stricken out by the Senate amendment insert ", or contract with persons to grow"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 22: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 22, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 4 of said amendment, after the word "at," insert "such important central"; in the same line, after the word "markets," insert "as the Secretary of Agriculture may from time to time designate and"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 27: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 27, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the amount proposed by the Senate amendment insert "$650,000"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 30: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 30, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 11 of said amendment, after the word "admission," insert "for immediate slaughter at ports of entry"; in the same line, after the word "cattle," insert "which are otherwise free from disease and which have not been exposed to the infection of any other disease within 60 days next before their exportation"; in line 17 of said amendment, after the word "ninety," change the period to a colon and insert: "Provided, That the importation of tick-infested cattle from any country referred to in this section in which foot-and-mouth disease exists, which existence shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture, is prohibited: Provided further, That all cattle imported under the provisions of this section shall be slaughtered in accordance with the provisions of the act of June 30, 1906 (34 Stat. L., p. 674), commonly called the meat-inspection amendment, and the rules and regulations promulgated thereunder by the Secretary of Agriculture, and that their hides shall be disposed of under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 34: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 34, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the section number proposed insert "10"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 36: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 36, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 2 of said amendment, after the word "authorize," insert "in his discretion"; and change the section number to "11"; and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 37: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 37, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the section number proposed by the Senate amendment insert "12"; and the Senate agree to the same.

LEASE OF PHOSPHATE LANDS.

Mr. PITTMAN and Mr. BRANDEGEE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 2156) to authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium or sodium.

Mr. REED. What is the bill?

Mr. PITTMAN. It is the potash bill, which I brought up day before yesterday and then asked unanimous consent for its consideration. It was intimated, however, that there was objection because some Senators desired to examine the bill. They have since that time had opportunity to examine it, and the report has been printed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, before that motion is put, I will request that the conference report on the food-administration bill be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the conference report on House bill 4961.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, there is a motion pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that a request to lay before the Senate a conference report is always in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is always in order to present a conference report, but I do not understand that when a motion is pending it is in order to disturb the order of business for any purpose whatever. I rise to a question of order. There is a motion pending, and it must be determined before anything else can be acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from Nevada that only when a motion to adjourn is pending is it not proper to lay a conference report before the Senate, according to Rule XXVII, which is the rule governing the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion, of course, is not debatable. The Chair lays before the Senate the conference report, which will be stated.

The Secretary proceeded to read the conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. This conference report was presented to the Senate day before yesterday, I believe. Has the Senate now voted to proceed to its consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator from Connecticut that it was in order to call up the conference report after the message came from the House this morning.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The question still is, then, I assume, whether or not the Senate will now proceed to its consideration? A conference report can be presented at any time, of course, but whether or not the Senate will proceed to its consideration must be determined by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I rise to a point of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon will state his point of order.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. As the President pro tempore has just decided, the presentation of the report is in order at any time under Rule XXVII, "except when the Journal is being read or a question of order or a motion to adjourn is pending." The rule provides further:

And when received—

It has been received—the question of proceeding to the consideration of the report, if raised, shall be immediately put, and shall be determined without debate.

I request, therefore, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to make this suggestion: I hope the chairman of the committee will not put us in the position where we can not even ask to have this matter go over or offer any reasons for having it go over until Monday. I suggest to the Chair that the Senator from Nevada had the floor, and when the Senator from Nevada had the floor nobody else could take the floor except by his consent. He had the floor and had made a motion—and is still holding the floor, as I understand—when the Senator from Oregon rose. But, however that may be, I appeal to the Senator from Oregon not to put us in a position where we can not have any conference among ourselves with reference to whether this conference report shall be taken up to-day or go over until Monday.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not know that I made myself plain in regard to the point of order which I suggested. I thought I distinctly heard the Senator from Nevada move to proceed to the consideration of a certain bill. Whereupon the Senator from Oregon rose and moved to proceed to the consideration of a conference report. That is not in order. The Senator from Nevada, it seems to me, is entitled to a vote on his motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not agree with the Senator, this being the case of the conference report; but, if the Senator desires, the Chair has no possible objection to the Senator taking an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The conference report had been presented before the Senator from Nevada made his motion, and was in the possession of the Chair. Now, the Senator from Nevada has moved to proceed to the consideration of a bill after the morning business has been closed. I think that motion is in order, and nothing else is in order except to vote on his motion one way or the other, either up or down. I do not see how he has lost the floor or how his motion has been swept away from the consideration of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say that the conference report having been presented, the question now is one of consideration, and the Chair, on reflection, thinks that the point of order made by the Senator from Connecticut is well taken under the circumstances, and will, therefore, reverse himself on that point.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMOOT. When was the conference report presented to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It must be taken up on motion.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask, when was it presented to the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was presented to the Senate on August 2.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, when the conference report was presented on the 2d day of August I said at the time that it had no official standing in the Senate, and was simply presented for the purpose of having it printed for the information of the Senate; that was all. The first time the report has been presented officially to the Senate is this morning, when the report came over from the other House, after having been voted upon favorably there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the officers of the Senate that the report was duly presented in accordance with precedent on the 2d of August, and, therefore, the Chair thinks the motion of the Senator from Nevada is the pending business of the Senate. That motion, of course, at this time is not debatable.

The Senator from Nevada moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2156, to authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium or sodium.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it proper to ask that the bill be read, so that we may know what the bill is before voting?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is, of course, proper. The Secretary will read the bill. Does the Senator desire the title read or the bill read in full?

Mr. KENYON. I should like to have the bill read in order that we may know what the bill is before voting.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I also ask that the report be read for the information of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. On a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill, can the bill be read before we have decided to proceed to its consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the bill might be read, but on objection would not think the report could be read.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I withdraw the request to have the bill read if the report can be read. I notice that it is shorter, and it will perhaps give the facts just as well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the reading of the report? The Chair hears none, and the report will be read before the question of the consideration of the bill is decided.

The Secretary read the report on Senate bill 2156, submitted by Mr. PITTMAN on the 3d instant, as follows:

The Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2156) to authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium, having had the same under consideration, begs leave to report it back to the Senate with amendments, and recommends that the bill do pass.

The provisions of this bill, with the exception of the amendments, are not unfamiliar to the Senate. With the exceptions named, the provisions in the bill are practically identical with the provisions concerning potash contained in the so-called general leasing bill known as H. R. 16136, which passed the House of Representatives during the second session of the Sixty-third Congress and the Senate during the third session of the Sixty-third Congress. The bill died, however, in conference upon the adjournment of that Congress and with it the legislation relative to potash. The same provision was carried in H. R. 406, which passed the House of Representatives during the first session of the Sixty-fourth Congress.

Although there has been an intense controversy over the provisions concerning oil in the general leasing bills referred to, there has never been any controversy with regard to the potash provision except in the Committee on Public Lands during the present consideration of this bill. The controversy is believed by the committee to have been settled by the amendments offered by the committee and approved by the Department of the Interior hereinafter set out.

The potash situation in the United States is extremely serious. Mr. John D. Pennock, chairman of the subcommittee of the chemical committee under the advisory committee on alkalies, said:

"I should say when you come to sum it all up that at the present time, from all these sources, we shall not get for the year 1917 over twenty to twenty-five thousand tons, perhaps, of potassium oxide. I think that is a high figure, out of the requirements of the country for 250,000 tons."

The Secretary of the Interior, in a letter addressed to Senator MYERS, under date of May 11, 1917, in discussing the bill under consideration, said:

"Potash is an essential in the production of food and cotton and essential in the manufacture of certain munitions of war. I am advised that in 1913 the United States imported approximately 529,000 tons, while the domestic production was 400 tons, and that during that year about 20,000 tons of potassium chloride were used in the industries and about 500,000 tons in agriculture. In 1916 the importation of potash was only about 10,000 tons and the domestic production in the neighborhood of 16,000 tons."

The apparent discrepancy between this statement and the testimony of Mr Pennock is explained by the fact that Mr. Pennock is referring to the concentrated product in the form of an oxide, whereas the Secretary is referring to the product in its usual commercial form of a chloride.

The extreme demand for potash is evidenced by the fact that its normal price is about $40 per ton while at the present time it is about $475 per ton. We must have a supply of potash. Germany now has a monopoly on the product. The German Government, through its officers, has boasted of this monopoly and has stated that the United States has gone into the war with a rope around its neck, and that it will be unable, through the lack of potash fertilizer, to meet its demands for foodstuffs.

There is an adequate supply of potash in the United States, but it can not be developed or utilized until means have been provided by legislation. The Secretary of the Interior, in the letter above referred to, says:

"One hundred and thirty thousand six hundred and twenty-nine acres of public lands containing this mineral are withdrawn from development. This area includes Searles Lake, Cal., one of the largest known deposits. I am informed that two reduction plants have recently been completed on the shores of the lake and that they have direct railroad connections, and can not only start work immediately but can increase their capacities if authority for the development be given."

The present bill has been carefully prepared to meet the requirements of the development of the known area above referred to and to encourage the prospecting for unknown supplies of potash on other portions of the public domain. To accomplish the first purpose the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to lease known deposits in areas not to exceed 2,560 acres under such conditions as will insure the production of potash and guarantee its sale to the public at a reasonable price. The second object of the bill is accomplished by granting the prospectors a permit on not to exceed 2,560 acres of land with the privilege of prospecting the same for potash. If potash is discovered, the prospector is granted one-fourth of such land contained in the permit as a reward for his industry and discovery. The remainder of such land contained in such permit is then subject to lease under the terms of the bill. In other words as to unknown deposits, a permittee may obtain title to 640 acres by discovery, and as to the known deposits a citizen of the United States may operate the same under a lease.

The amendments recommended by the committee are as follows:

(1) In the title strike out "or sodium."

(2) Line 5, page 1, strike out words "qualified under this act" and insert "who is a citizen of the United States, an association of such citizens, or a corporation organized under the laws of any State or Territory thereof,".

(3) Line 10, page 1, strike out "public lands belonging to the United States" and insert in lieu thereof "lands of the United States not known to contain valuable deposits of the kinds above described,".

(4) Line 19, page 2, strike out words "permits or" and insert, after the words "may be," in same line, "operated by the United States, or,".
(5) Line 12, page 6, strike out words "phosphate, oil, gas,".
(6) Add to line 11, page 7, the following proviso:
"Provided, That nothing in this act shall prevent any State or Territory wherein the lands or deposits leased are located from levying and collecting taxes on improvements upon or the output or product from any lands or minerals leased under this act."
(7) Insert an additional section, as follows:
"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to incorporate in every lease issued under the provisions of this act a provision reserving to him the right to regulate the price of minerals extracted and sold from the leased premises, which stipulation shall specifically provide that the price or prices fixed shall be such as to yield a fair and reasonable return to the lessee upon his investment and to secure to the consumer the product at the lowest price reasonable and consistent with the foregoing: Provided, That each lease issued under this act shall also stipulate that during the present war or during any other war in which the United States may be engaged the Secretary of the Interior shall have authority to so regulate the disposal of the minerals produced under such lease as to secure their distribution and lease wholly within the limits of the United States or its possessions."

There is attached hereto, as a part of this report, a letter of Mr. Bernard M. Baruch, addressed to Senator PITTMAN, and that portion of the letter of the Secretary of the Interior of May 11, 1917, addressed to Senator MYERS, dealing with potash:

THE ADVISORY COMMISSION,
COUNCIL OF NATIONAL DEFENSE,
Washington, D. C., June 28, 1917.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The potash situation in the United States can not be better stated than was stated by Dr. Ostwald, an eminent German scientist, who stated that if the United States entered the war it would do so with a rope around its neck. This prediction was based upon our dependence upon the German potash supply, without access to which agricultural production in this country would suffer serious curtailments.

To meet this situation a study was made of the possible sources of potash within the limits of the United States. This investigation developed the fact that the Searles Lake property in California could be made to produce a supply of considerable magnitude; furthermore, it is the only material source so far developed.

Action tending to open up this field will be of enormous benefit to the agricultural interests in this country, and in fact if some source of supply is not almost immediately made available serious consequences might result.

Stocks of potash available in this country at the outbreak of the war have been exhausted. Some relief in this direction must be provided in the immediate future.

Very truly, yours,

BERNARD M. BARUCH.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, May 11, 1917.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt of your request for report upon S. 2156, a bill "To authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium or sodium."

The measure appears to be identical with sections relating to potash in H. R. 406, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, as reported by the Senate Committee on Public Lands May 18, 1916. Said H. R. 406 also provided for the development and disposition of deposits of oil, gas, and phosphate, and I am of opinion that legislation providing for and encouraging the development of all of these deposits should be had at the earliest possible moment as a war measure.

Potash is an essential in the production of food and cotton and essential in the manufacture of certain munitions of war. I am advised that in 1913 the United States imported approximately 529,000 tons, while the domestic production was 400 tons, and that during that year about 20,000 tons of potassium chloride were used in the industries and about 500,000 tons in agriculture. In 1916 the importation of potash was only about 10,000 tons and the domestic production in the neighborhood of 16,000 tons. One hundred and thirty thousand six hundred and twenty-nine acres of public lands containing this mineral are withdrawn from development. This area includes Searles Lake, Cal., one of the largest known deposits. I am informed that two reduction plants have recently been completed on the shores of the lake and that they have direct railroad connections, and can not only start work immediately but can increase their capacities if authority for the development be given.

Phosphate rock is present in large and valuable quantities in the public lands of Idaho, Wyoming, Utah, Montana, and Florida, and approximately 2,400,000 acres containing such deposits are at present withdrawn. This mineral also is an exceedingly valuable element of fertilization of farm lands, and the supply at reasonable prices would greatly stimulate our agricultural production.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE, Secretary.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question before the Senate is the motion to proceed to the consideration of the bill concerning which this report is made.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2156) to authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium or sodium, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendments of the committee.

The first amendment was, on page 1, line 5, after the words "any applicant," to strike out "qualified under this act" and insert "who is a citizen of the United States, an association of such citizens, or a corporation organized under the laws of any State or Territory thereof," so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to grant to any applicant who is a citizen of the United States, an association of such citizens, or a corporation organized under the laws of any State or Territory thereof, a prospecting permit, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 1, after the word "on," to strike out "public lands belonging to the United States" and insert "lands of the United States not known to contain valuable deposits of the kinds above described," so as to read:

A prospecting permit which shall give the exclusive right to prospect for chlorides, sulphates, carbonates, borates, silicates, or nitrates of potassium, or borates, carbonates, or nitrates of sodium, or borates of calcium, or associated similar salts on lands of the United States not known to contain valuable deposits of the kinds above described for a period of not exceeding two years.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator that that amendment go over for the present, as I desire to offer an amendment to accompany it; and by letting it go over we can amend it without asking for a reconsideration.

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no objection to that, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will proceed with the next amendment.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 24, after the word "by," to strike out "permits or"; and on the same line, after the word "be," to insert "operated by the United States, or," so as to read:

All other lands described and embraced in such a prospecting permit from and after the exercise of the right to patent accorded to the discoverer, and all other lands known to contain such valuable deposits as are enumerated in section 1 hereof and not covered by leases, may be operated by the United States, or leased by the Secretary of the Interior, through advertisement, competitive bidding, or such other methods as he may by general regulations adopt, etc.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be agreed to, without objection.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Nevada, having this bill in charge, why this amendment was inserted, which would permit the United States to enter upon the public domain and operate mining claims.

It seems to me that any effort upon the part of the Government to engage in mining operations must be attended with very great expense, and the operations would not be at all satisfactory; and I can not conceive of the United States going into the mining business. If it does, it will certainly result in extravagance, in waste, in inefficiency, and in nonproductiveness. It is a departure to which I could hardly reconcile myself; and I shall be very glad to hear the Senator from Nevada, if he will, give such explanation as he desires to give relative to this radical departure from the policy heretofore governing and obtaining in this country with respect to the development of our mineral resources.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I hold largely the same views with regard to the Government operation of mining properties as does the Senator from Utah, but this is undoubtedly an exception.

In the first place, the known supplies of potash in this country, as we are informed by the various governmental departments and by all those who are familiar with the subject, are very limited. The report shows and the hearings before the committee show that the principal deposit in the United States to-day is at Searles Lake, Cal. That deposit is in solution, or brine. It is liquid. In the very nature of things, its development will be monopolistic. There can not be competition in it. These solutions may be drained from this lake from any one point. There is another phase of it, and that is that there is competition in the sale of all other minerals that I know of except potash. The only great supply of potash in the world is in Germany. Germany has had a monopoly of the potash of the world for years. Germany controls the price of that potash, though it is owned by private individuals. It has used its power of control over the potash in Germany for international political purposes. It has controlled the export and raised and lowered the price as it saw fit.

Why, let me call your attention to a statement on that subject. It will probably astonish the Senators. This is from the hearings:

The following recently published quotation of privy councilor of the German Empire, Wilhelm Ostwald, is of interest and has a direct bearing on the situation:

"America went into the war like a man with a rope around his neck which is in enemy's hands and is pretty tightly drawn. With its tremendous deposits, Germany has a world monopoly in potash, a point of immense value which can not be reckoned too highly when once this war is going to be settled. It is in Germany's power to dictate which of the nations shall have plenty of food and which shall starve. Germany is in the position, often realized by Bismarck, to handle the long arm of the lever. The dearth of potash, as well as the ever-increasing results of the U-boat war, is working in Germany's favor."

It is that peculiar situation that has led the committee to make an exception with regard to this matter. Now, then, the Senator from Utah would not have that deposit in Searles Lake worked unless it could be so worked as to inure to the benefit of the people of this country. It may be necessary in the lease to specify terms which will guarantee the supply of that potash to the people of this country at such prices that they can afford to use it in farming; and if no one will take a lease under those conditions, if no one will take a lease under conditions that this Government thinks essential to the welfare of the people of this country, then the Government must operate those deposits itself, because we must have the potash. These hearings disclose the fact that potash is absolutely essential for the production of foodstuffs in this country.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. There is no more important ingredient to the agricultural interest than potash. There are others. There are three ingredients that make up what is called the balanced fertilizer. They are phosphate, potash, and ammonia.

I rose to call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to the fact that previous to the war, on May 1, 1912, statistics furnished me by the Agricultural Department show that muriate of potash 95 per cent pure was $40.15 a ton. On January 1, 1916, it was $500 a ton. It is now selling at $360 a ton. So it is only a question of time when the potash that has been put from year to year on the farms throughout the country will have been exhausted.

It is not very soluble except through the mechanical action of the plant itself, and from one crop to another it will stay in the soil. The lack of it is beginning to be evidenced throughout the country in a deterioration of the plant itself and in a falling off of the fruitage.

If the Senator from Nevada will permit me further, I see the difficulty before us in reference to the Government entering into it. In this emergency where the Government owns the land and has the deposits and this ingredient is so essential, I think it is a wise provision to put in the bill giving the Government the power to furnish the people of the country this needed article. I am not going to discuss the question of embarking on it as a policy, but I personally have no objection to this, as the very foundation upon which the prosperity of this country depends is the farmer. I think if the Government is going to depart from its custom of engaging in business it may very well take the initiative in furnishing people those things upon which the production of agriculture depends, and which ultimately spell the prosperity or failure of this country.

I call attention to this to show that even now the prices are prohibitive. We are depending upon the small trace of potash that is found in cottonseed meal, but as indicated there is nothing like an adequate amount for proper production throughout the entire agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I did not intend to go into any general discussion at this time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Nevada whether later on he purposes generally entering into a discussion of the merits of the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. Not unless there are some questions asked, because the merits of the bill seem so obvious that I do not want to take up the time of the Senate with debate. I have said all I desire to say in the report on behalf of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. On what page is the Senate committee amendment under discussion?

Mr. PITTMAN. It is the amendment allowing the Government of the United States to operate these potash deposits.

Mr. NORRIS. On what page?

Mr. PITTMAN. Line 24, page 2.

Mr. NORRIS. I have it now.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I would not favor as a general policy the Government going into the mining business or into any other business, as far as that is concerned, except where it is necessary for the public welfare. In this particular case I consider it essential to the public welfare that these potash deposits shall be worked and worked immediately. I want them worked through individual enterprise if possible, and if not possible I still want them worked.

I will say that it is not the intention of the present administration—I speak now with authority—to operate as a Government proposition any of these deposits, provided they can obtain the development of those fields by individual capital and energy on a reasonable basis.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I wish to submit to the Senator from Nevada a suggestion, and then upon the suggestion predicate a question. Has not the liberal policy of our Government which encouraged individuals to enter upon the mineral lands of the United States and prospect and develop them and obtain patent thereto resulted in the greatest good to all, and secured the most rapid working and development of the mineral deposits found in such lands? In other words, under our present mineral policy have we not obtained the very best results in the extraction of minerals from the earth and in putting into circulation the mineral wealth which has so greatly enriched our country?

Now, if such policy has been a successful one—and I think it has—why would not a continuation of that policy answer the present situation? If the potash lands have been withdrawn from entry, why not rescind the order of withdrawal and throw them open to private entry and permit the individual to go upon the lands and work them and obtain title thereto? It is obvious that if the price of potash is as high as stated by the Senator from Nevada it would encourage private capital and individual effort, so that these lands would be developed and developed quickly in order that the occupants and owners of the same might reap the rich harvest that is now before it. We all know what activity there has been in copper, lead, zinc, iron, and other mining properties owing to the high prices paid for these metals since the war began. The Senator knows that there never has been greater mining activity, and that there are now being developed hundreds of mines supposed to have been worked out that have been idle for years, and great quantities of mineral wealth are being shipped from them. Prospects are being worked, new mines discovered and operated, and the wisdom of the mining policy of the Government demonstrated.

Does not the Senator think the same policy with respect to potash lands would result in their development as it has resulted in the development of other mineral lands of the United States?

Mr. PITTMAN. There is no great difference between the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Nevada, but I do not think the Senator from Utah is familiar with this peculiar situation. The bill does provide for prospecting. The bill provides for prospecting for unknown deposits, and it gives a title in fee to a portion of the discovered territory just the same as the present mining law. There is not any distinction between that portion of the bill with regard to prospecting and the existing mineral law except in this, that under the existing mining law a man has no particular right on the public domain for any particular period of time. While he is prospecting under this bill he gets a permit which protects him in an exclusive right to prospect on 2,560 acres for two years. If during that time he discovers a deposit of potash, the Government gives him in fee simple one-quarter of that land, or 640 acres, as a bonus for his discovery, and that 640 acres is operated and worked by him just like all other mining property. But when there is no discovery to be made, when the discovery has already been made, when it is not unknown mineral land, but Government mineral land in which potash is known to exist, then such conditions do not call into exercise the energy or skill of any prospector. The Government then says as to this deposit which the agent of the Government itself has possibly discovered, we will lease such land, or work it ourselves if satisfactory leases can not be made——

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. HUSTING. While the Senator is discussing the question whether the present system of mining has been entirely satisfactory, I should like to suggest to him the further question whether he does not consider the coal-mining situation more analogous to this situation than the mining of gold and silver, and why should not the Government at the present time take the control of the mines and exercise the right to operate them. In that case we in the Northwest would not be in the deplorable situation we are now in, whereby, although the winter is fast approaching, there is not, by any means, a sufficient amount of coal in sight obtainable to keep the people from freezing. Unless extraordinary means, drastic means, are used in the next four weeks the Northwest will find itself in the midst of winter without any supply of coal, notwithstanding coal is found in abundance by those who claim absolute control and ownership of the coal,

Mr. PITTMAN. There is even a distinction between the coal and potash. We know that there are millions of acres of coal in the United States and that a large portion of it is withdrawn. It can not be utilized in any way at present. But experts both in the Government employ and out of the Government employ state that the only practical deposit of potash to-day to meet the immediate needs of the Government is in one little lake in California probably 10 miles square. It must be operated as a monopoly. You could not give a man title to it without giving him a monopoly. There is no way to do it. You can not conceive any way on earth by which that deposit can be fairly and economically and justly mined except either by the Government itself or by lessees of the Government. That is the thing we are dealing with. We are dealing in this bill both with that known deposit and with the unknown deposits. I ask the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to read the report that has just been read into the RECORD.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I hope the Senator from Utah will not object to that clause in this bill. There was no intention of the committee to report a bill to change the general policy of the country and to launch the Government into general mining transactions. I am as much in favor of encouraging private enterprise in the development of mines as in all other business, but in this particular it seems wise in view of the limited supply, in view of this great lake, that the Government should control it. Beyond that, if private enterprise will not take out what is absolutely necessary to the country during this war or any other time it is provided that the Government may do it itself. Realizing the fact that Germany practically controls all of its potash supply to the equal extent as though it owned it and operated it we thought it wise for this Government to be authorized to operate Searles Lake if it was found necessary. It is not launching the Government into a general mining enterprise, because there are millions of acres of coal and of land where other metals may be mined requiring discovery and enterprise and mining operations all over the country.

I hope the Senator from Utah will not object to the Government operating this particular property if it is found necessary. I do not believe it will be necessary, but it may be. Beyond that the Government has this great potash supply. It ought not only to have an authorization to operate it but to control the price and distribution in case of war. We felt that it was wise in this particular case to give that power in the bill and place that limitation upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the object of the committee was as just stated by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], that can be easily accomplished by offering an amendment to the bill, and I shall offer certain amendments later.

I call attention to the report that the Geological Survey considers, after an examination made, that there are at least 130,629 acres of the public lands containing potash, for that many acres of public land have already been withdrawn from entry on the ground that they are potash lands. I have no doubt at all if our Government had allowed the prospectors to go into the State of Utah and enter potash land and work it the same as they develop other minerals, instead of having a few tons of potash produced a year, as in the case to-day, there would have been many, many times the amount of potash produced in that one State than we find produced to-day.

I had a sample of mineral sent to me the other day by a prospector with the request that I take it to the Geological Survey and find out what it contained and what the mineral was. I sent the sample to the Geological Survey for an analysis, and the report showed that it was almost pure potash, and from what the prospector told me there were mountains of it. But if the prospector filed on the land containing the potash under the mining laws as they exist to-day, as he has a perfect right to do, he never would be allowed to secure a title to the land. Just as soon as the filing was made and sent to Washington there would be a field agent sent to make the examination, and when it was discovered that the entry contained potash it would be immediately withdrawn from entry, and in such case the prospector loses all of his time, all of his expense, with nothing to show for it. It is true the Government would benefit from his labors. The prospector would not be allowed to secure a title.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. The very object of this bill is to make these lands subject to lease.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; Mr. President I know the object of the bill is to provide that all such lands can be leased. That, to my knowledge, has been the object of the department for the last 14 years.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator object to any leasing?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, I abhor any policy that makes of the Government of the United States a landlord, a lessor, and being in a position to say that a man who goes out and spends all of his time and, more than likely, all he has on earth, and all that he can possibly secure from friends, to discover a mineral location shall then have it taken from him.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. KELLOGG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. Just as soon as the Senator from Minnesota gets through I shall yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will ask the Senator from Utah if he does not think it wise for this Government to control its potash supplies, as foreign Governments have done as to theirs?

Mr. SMOOT. Well, Mr. President, foreign people live under different laws from those under which the people of the United States live. Foreign Governments do a great many things which the people of the United States would not consent to have done under their form of government.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Utah is of course opposed to any leasing system, but there is somewhat of a compromise proposed by this bill. In the very instance which the Senator gives of his constituent—taking him as an example—if this bill were on the statute books and he had discovered territory where potash existed in great abundance, and he would be able to get a patent for 640 acres of land, does not the Senator think that would be enough?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the provisions of the bill the party seeking to discover such land and locate on it may not even have the opportunity to make the discovery. We are providing here that the property may be operated by the Government of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. And there is nothing at all to prevent the Government of the United States as soon as a lease is applied for from beginning the production of potash on the very land on which the man has asked a lease.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Utah will read section 2 of the bill he will find that the real intent of the proposed law is that a person prospecting for and finding potash shall be able to obtain a patent for 640 acres of the land. By his discovery it has been disclosed that all around that 640-acre tract very likely there are other deposits of potash. It is not necessary to prospect for that; this prospector has disclosed that by his energy and his efforts. He is given a reward by getting a fee-simple title to 640 acres. Then, it would be hardly fair, after through his energy the discovery is made, for other people to come in and get title to the remainder of the land in that particular tract. There is where the provision applies, that the remainder of the land shall be leased, and if it is not leased the Government shall have the right to operate it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] do not agree on what the real object of the bill is. I take it for granted that what the Senator from Nevada says is true, that there is no intention on the part of the Government of the United States to develop and work these mines in case satisfactory leases can be made, but what we have got to recognize is what the law, if this bill becomes a law, says and what it means.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator does not contend that in case a prospector goes upon land and discovers potash the Government would then withdraw that land upon which he discovered potash or would refuse to give him title to 640 acres of land?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, Mr. President, the Government can do so under this bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not understand that to be the case at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know what the Senator understands, but that is what the bill provides.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think not; I disagree with the Senator from Utah there. My construction of the bill is that people are allowed to prospect for potash, but wherever there are lands upon which there is known to be potash they are not allowed to prospect; that the Government holds such lands back.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. And the Government could operate a plant on lands where it is known that potash exists; but where it is not known to exist and the prospector goes on the lands and finds potash, the Government could not then refuse to reward him for his discovery, because he has discovered it. It is not known when he enters upon the land that it contains potash, but he, by his work, develops that fact, and it then becomes known. However, in that situation the Government can not say "Since we know potash is there, we will not let you have title to the lands." That would be absolutely unfair.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken. A prospector can file upon public land to-day, thinking it contains potash or other minerals, and the Government withdraw it before a discovery is made as I have stated before, and if this bill becomes a law he could make an application for a lease and it be denied him.

Mr. FLETCHER. I thought the very purpose of the bill was to provide for just that sort of case.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill provides as to certain of these lands that they may be "leased by the Secretary of the Interior through advertisement, competitive bidding, or such other methods as he may by general regulations adopt," and so forth.

Another thing, under the practice to-day, if a locator locates a claim for potash he never would get title to the land, as the land would be withdrawn from entry as soon as an examination was made. The Senator from Nevada knows that.

Mr. PITTMAN. One moment——

Mr. SMOOT. All of the western Senators know that that is the practice.

Mr. PITTMAN. I shall have to disagree with the Senator from Utah there. If a prospector started to prospect and it were suspected that he was going to make a discovery, the department would probably withdraw the land and then defeat him; but under the mining law after a man makes a discovery you can not take it away from him because he then has a vested right.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, provided the land is not withdrawn before the discovery is made, of course, the Senator from Nevada is right; but that is not the practice. The practice is to withdraw the land after it is entered upon just as soon as it is possible for some agent of one of the departments in Washington to go and examine the land.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; but the Senator from Utah——

Mr. SMOOT. That is how potash lands have been already withdrawn. There are 130,000 acres of potash lands that have been withdrawn, and I have no doubt, Mr. President, that many of those lands were lands which were undertaken to be entered by citizens of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. But will not the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to ask the Senator a question in that connection. The Senator says that 130,000 acres of land have been already withdrawn?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. But those are lands not known to contain potash; at least all of them are not. Those lands are available for investigation under this act, are they not?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator says that those lands are not known to contain potash?

Mr. FLETCHER. Exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. The very reason they were withdrawn was because the department learned that some one thought they did contain potash.

Mr. FLETCHER. The department may have thought so or may have suspected that they did. For instance, I know that the department has withdrawn lands in Florida on the theory that they contained phosphate, but, as a matter of fact, it has been found since those lands were withdrawn that a great many, if not all, of those lands—I will not say all of them, but a large proportion of them—do not contain phosphate at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there have been large parts of counties in the State of Utah withdrawn as oil lands.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is because they were suspected to contain oil.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly; and the only theory upon which they could be withdrawn was that they were oil lands.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely; but now this bill is intended, as I understand its purpose, to encourage investigation and promote the development of potash on public lands. So, in order to do that it is said, "Here we have withdrawn so many thousand acres of land; we believe they may contain potash. If you will go upon those lands and make the proper investigation and study, and take the proper steps to ascertain the facts, and if you find potash we will give you 640 acres of that land." That is the purpose of the bill, and that land is all to come out of these withdrawals.

Mr. SMOOT. We can give title to 640 acres of the land; there is no question about that.

Mr. NORRIS. The Government can not help itself; it is imperative that it shall. The man is entitled to it as a matter of right.

Mr. SMOOT. It is imperative, Mr. President, if a permit to go upon the land is granted.

Mr. NORRIS. And the object of this bill is to grant those permits and give authority to do that.

Mr. SMOOT. I know what the object of the bill is, and I know what it says.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but the Senator argues as though he did not know what it says and did not know what it means.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to go on; but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to suggest a compromise of this matter, to which I think it will be easy to agree. I was before the Public Lands Committee during the investigation of this and the general bill which the committee had under consideration. The understanding was in the committee that there was but one known deposit in the United States, and that was at Searles Lake. Although I do not like the idea of the Government operating, and voted against the bill in the committee, nevertheless I feel that if we confine the operation of the Government to that one deposit no injury will be worked. It was stated in the committee, and repeated time and time again, that that was the only known deposit in the United States; and if the operations of the Government were confined to that locality other locations would be opened up under the general provisions of the bill. If the bill can be amended in that respect, so as to let the Government, if it so desires, take over the Searles Lake deposit and operate it, I say, well and good. I suggest that to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that was exactly one of the amendments that I intended to offer to this bill. It has been stated upon the floor to-day that there is only one known deposit of potash in the United States, and that is at Searles Lake. What I want to provide for is that the Government of the United States may, if necessary, operate the potash beds at Searles Lake, and when the committee amendments are finally disposed of, and when I have a right to offer an amendment, I am going to offer such an amendment.

There was another thing, Mr. President, that was understood in the committee, and that was that this bill should only apply to potash and not to sodium, and I am going to offer an amendment to the bill striking out all that pertains to sodium. I take it that even the committee had that in view, because in the report made by the Senator from Nevada I find on page 2 near the bottom of the page, "The amendments recommended by the committee are as follows," and the very first amendment recommended is to the title striking out the words "or sodium."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield further?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think the Senator from Nevada will admit that it was intended that this bill should apply only to potassium, because in the general bill which we brought in at the same time sodium is treated separately.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is my idea of the intention of the committee. There is a special provision in the leasing bill in regard to sodium, although originally the two minerals were placed together in the one bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, will the Senator allow me to suggest the amendments right now, and we can settle this question very quickly, if the amendments are satisfactory?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Utah will pardon the Chair, the Chair is advised that no unanimous-consent agreement has been made that the committee amendments shall be first considered. So amendments from the floor are in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, of course, I would be in order in offering amendments. I move to strike out on line 10, page 1, beginning with the last word in the line, the words "or borates, carbonates, or nitrates of sodium, or borates of calcium, or associated similar salts on public lands belonging to the United States" and insert, in line 2, before the word "lands" the words "on public"; and also after the word "States," on page 2, line 2, to strike out "not known to contain valuable deposits of the kinds above described" and insert "except lands in San Bernardino County, Cal.," so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to grant to any applicant who is a citizen of the United States, an association of such citizens, or a corporation organized under the laws of any State or Territory thereof, a prospecting permit which shall give the exclusive right to prospect for chlorides, sulphates, carbonates, borates, silicates, or nitrates of potassium on public lands of the United States, except lands in San Bernardino County, Cal., for a period of not exceeding two years.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. Is not the committee amendment at the bottom of page 2 the pending amendment?

Mr. PITTMAN. It is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I make a point of order against the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that the Senate had passed over the amendment referred to.

Mr. NORRIS. We can not take up the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah while another amendment is pending. Why not go on with the committee amendments?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the pending amendment is the amendment on page 2, line 24, which will be disposed of first.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Senate has passed over the amendment at the top of page 2.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I think we had better try to perfect the provision at the top of the page, because what follows is dependent on that, and it seems to me, if we are going to get this measure through by 2 o'clock, action should be taken.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think that the provision at the bottom of the page is dependent on what is above.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have a right, then, to offer an amendment to the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has that right.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, I make the point that the amendment on page 2, lines 1, 2, and 3, has already been adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. No. I will state to the Senator that I asked the Senator from Nevada to allow that amendment to go over temporarily. It has not been adopted.

Mr. HUSTING. My understanding is that it was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment of the Senator from Utah, as I understand, applies to the text of the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, there have been no amendments agreed to as yet, except the first one.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah asked unanimous consent that we pass over the committee amendment at the top of page 2, and the Senator from Nevada, having the bill in charge, said he had no objection to that course being pursued. We did not vote upon or act upon the amendment at the top of page 2, but passed to the amendment at the bottom of page 2.

Mr. NORRIS. But that would make no difference, so far as the amendment of the Senator from Utah is concerned, because there is a pending amendment, as I understand—and I made inquiry to find out some time ago when the Senator from Nevada was discussing it—and that amendment is on line 24, page 2. So it is not in order for the Senator from Utah to propose the amendment he seeks to offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct about that. There is an amendment pending, although the amendment at the top of page 2 was passed over. The present occupant of the chair was not in the Chamber at the time, but accepts the statement of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] as absolutely correct. The Chair, of course, has no other way of deciding the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Chair is correct in his ruling.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask the Senator from Utah if he does not think that this bill will be better than no legislation at all? In that connection, let me say that I share his views largely regarding the existing lockup of the natural resources of the country in the West arising from divergent views as to the policy which shall be pursued. I realize that that is producing an increase in the prices of oil and other things, and it is a most unfortunate condition; but, as I understand, this is a compromise bill that both sides of this controversy are willing shall go through, and, of course, its passage will not prevent the agitation of the Senator for the advancement of his views with reference to our public domain generally. Is it not wise to avail ourselves of this opportunity and put it through now?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, I am not going to make any violent opposition to the passage of this bill. Of course, if I had my way, such a bill as this never would pass the Senate; but what I want is to have the bill perfected so that it carries out the idea that the committee has, and that is that it treats only upon the question of potash, in the first place; and then another point is that if the United States is to operate potash mines it ought to be confined to the Searles Lake deposit. With those amendments I shall say nothing more about it, but allow it to pass.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I ask that the motion of the Senator from Utah be divided. He first moves to strike out, and then afterwards to insert. In other words, there are two different questions involved in the motion.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator has passed on from that now.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Utah moves to strike out all after the word "potassium," in line 10, down to——

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that has been held to be out of order, which I think it is. The pending amendment was the amendment of the committee on page 2, line 24, to insert "operated by the United States."

Mr. PITTMAN. Well, I ask unanimous consent to go back to——

Mr. NORRIS. I object to that.

Mr. HUSTING. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. FLETCHER. Has the Senator from Utah an amendment to offer to the amendment on line 24?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I will read it after offering the amendment.

In connection with that, Mr. President, I move to strike out lines 22 and 23 down to the word "hereof," and, after the word "leases," insert "and the potash public lands in San Bernardino County, Cal., may be operaed by the United States." In connection with the committee amendment it will read as follows:

All other lands described and embraced in such prospecting permit from and after the exercise of the right to patent accorded to the discoverer, and not covered by leases, and the potash public lands in San Bernardino County, Cal., may be operated by the United States or leased by the Secretary of the Interior—

And so forth.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, to that I make the point of order that it is not an amendment to the pending amendment. It seeks to strike out part of the text of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What rule does the Senator from Nebraska cite in support of his position?

Mr. NORRIS. The general parliamentary rule. Here is the amendment of the committee that is pending—in line 24, the insertion of the words "operated by the United States, or." That is the pending amendment. As an amendment to that amendment the Senator from Utah moves to strike out lines 22 and 23 down to and including the word "hereof," which is no part whatever of the committee amendment. He also moves to insert certain words after the word "leases," which is another amendment to the text and not to the committee amendment. It does not purport to be an amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say this: The words stricken out and the words added by the amendment simply apply to lands to be operated by the United States, and that is the amendment that is offered by the committee. It limits the lands to be operated by the United States to the potash public lands in San Bernardino County, Cal.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, that amendment can be offered after the committee amendments are disposed of. It will have the same effect that it will have if offered now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Nebraska pardon the Chair? The present occupant of the chair is advised that there was no unanimous-consent agreement entered into that the committee amendments should be disposed of first. Hence, under the status of affairs, any Senator would have the right to amend any part of the text.

Mr. NORRIS. All right. I am not basing my point of order on that ground, Mr. President. I assume that that is true, although it has been so general to do that that it has almost become a rule to consider committee amendments first. But waive that. We have a certain amendment pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Nebraska please state what the amendment is?

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment is to insert, after the word "be," in line 24, page 2, the words "operated by the United States, or." That is the pending amendment. It is true that that is subject to amendment, but——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator pardon the Chair? The records of the Senate show that that amendment was agreed to, and the Journal so states.

Mr. NORRIS. Has that amendment been agreed to?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not so understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair is advised that the Journal of the Senate so shows—that the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. I was not aware of that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was not, either.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think anybody else was.

Mr. SMOOT. I doubt, Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. But even if it was, I submit to the Senator that it does not prevent his amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware that I can offer these amendments later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They are in order now.

Mr. SMOOT. I was trying to hasten the consideration of the bill, so that we could vote upon it before 2 o'clock; but if the Senator insists upon it, I will not say anything more at this time, and will offer the amendments later.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I dislike very much to interfere with the program of the junior Senator from Nevada——

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator need not hesitate at all.

Mr. KING (continuing). Because I am anxious to have this bill passed if the majority of the members of the committee desire its passage. I think the legislation exceedingly unwise, very dangerous, and the entering wedge to the destruction of the present mineral system of the United States. I shall vote against this bill. I am not in sympathy with its provisions or the method of its construction; but I shall pretermit any discussion now if the Senators desire to pass it before 2 o'clock, although I should prefer to have discussed some of the more objectionable and obnoxious features that are found in this measure.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the fertilizer situation in this country is very acute. I think it is important that we take steps so as to provide a means of supplying the producers of agricultural products with this necessary article. Not only is it acute, not only do we need the potash, but we need some control of prices. The prices are prohibitory, and the prices of fertilizers are necessarily high. For that reason I am in favor of the Government operating these mines when it becomes necessary, in order that they can have proper control over the price of this article. It is a very essential element of plant food. Therefore I am in favor of the bill, and I am in favor of this provision of the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am advised by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] that the Secretary informs him that the Journal shows that the amendment containing the words "operated by the United States," as found in lines 24 and 25, has been adopted. I submit, Mr. President, that that is not correct. The Chair asked the question as to whether that amendment should be adopted, and I rose and addressed the Chair before the Chair announced his conclusion; or, at least, if he announced his conclusion, it was while I was addressing the Chair. I certainly intended to oppose that amendment and to discuss it, and if the Journal shows its adoption it is inaccurate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will pardon the Chair. The present occupant of the chair was not in the chair when the record was made, and the present occupant speaks only of what the record discloses. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I have nothing further to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator that while I am in favor of this amendment and he is opposed to it, I do not want to have any snap judgment taken. I did not know that the Chair had announced the amendment adopted; and if it has been done, and the Senator from Utah wants to discuss it or have a vote on it, I think he should have that opportunity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to reconsider would be in order.

Mr. PITTMAN. I ask unanimous consent that we reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent for that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada asks unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on page 2, line 24, was adopted. Is there objection? There being none, the question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. KING and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I yield to my colleague, the senior Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be adopted in this place; and I want to call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to the fact that if this amendment on page 2, line 24, should be rejected, then I shall offer an amendment following the word "lessee," on page 3, line 24, in the following form:

and the potash lands in San Bernardino County, Cal., may be operated by the United States.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, as far as the Senator from Nevada is concerned, I am satisfied that that would accomplish every purpose at the present time. As I have stated time and again, all of the reports we have from public and private sources show that the only potash deposit in the United States that is material at all is in San Bernardino County, Cal., and that is the only deposit in which the Government has any deep interest right now—I might say the only one in which it has any immediate interest—and that is what we want to protect by the right of the Government to operate, so that if they can not get satisfactory leases for that lake they will operate it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I have no objection whatever to that, and shall offer that amendment; and it seems to me that that is as far as any Senator could ask to go. It will accomplish all that the Government is trying to accomplish, and I have not any doubt but that the leases will be made and that the Government will not have to operate even the mines at Searles Lake; but I am perfectly willing to give the Government of the United States authority to do it in case satisfactory leases can not be obtained.

I know the necessity for the production of potash in the United States; I know its value as a food producer, and I certainly would not do anything to interfere in any way with the production of this necessary article in the United States. But it does seem to me, Mr. President, that when we go so far as to say that the United States can go out and spend money in prospecting and hunting for lands and operating them, we are going altogether too far.

I am perfectly willing to take a vote now upon the proposition of striking that out, and let the Senate decide, with the understanding that I shall offer the amendment later.

Mr. HUSTING. Mr. President, this bill was before the committee at several meetings. I did not happen to be present at the last meeting of the committee. I believe there are a number of members of the Committee on Public Lands who were only persuaded to report out this bill, or one similar to it, because of the exigencies confronting us. It was because of a desire to have potash development at the earliest opportunity; and so a tentative bill was agreed upon in the committee, with the view of getting this matter disposed of speedily.

If some of the amendments tentatively proposed here by members of the committee are going to be injected into this discussion, I want to say to the chairman that I am very much afraid the bill not only will not get through before 2 o'clock to-day, but, if kept before the Senate, will not get through for a considerable length of time.

I was not present when this particular bill was reported out. Otherwise I should have asked for a certain amendment which I am going to propose when it is reached.

Coming down now to discuss this particular amendment providing that potash deposits may be operated by the United States, I want to say a few words in favor of the idea of the United States Government having the power to operate this sort of deposits. There is only one known deposit in the country, and that is at Searles Lake, and this particular provision pertains particularly to that, but there is no reason in the world why it should not apply to any deposit of potash.

I am somewhat astonished to find the claim made here that mining in the United States under private ownership is a success. I want to take issue with that so far as it pertains to certain things. I will mention only two. There are many others. One is oil and the other is coal.

I want to put the query whether Senators think that in regard to potash—which, it is claimed here, and rightfully so, is so necessary to fertilize the soil of this country—we should tie ourselves up in the same way that we have already tied ourselves up with respect to coal and oil? We have heard a great deal about oil. It would take a long time to tell a little about it only; but we know that as far as the price of oil is concerned, as far as the production of oil is concerned, and as far as the distribution of oil is concerned this country stands absolutely helpless and powerless to-day. We have simply given away a source of wealth and power in this country that renders the country itself in the face of it absolutely powerless. There is no pretense here that we can regulate the price of the production or distribution of oil. It has passed into private ownership. We know what it has meant to this country. We know that we have been trying to deal with the oil question for almost half a century, and instead of this country running the oil business the oil business is pretty nearly running the country. At least it is dictating to the country, and the country can not dictate to it.

How about the coal situation? I am going to speak at length some day upon the coal situation in the particular part of the country from which I come—the Northwest. We hear the private system of mining praised here—the ownership system—and what do we find here to-day? I have just come back from a visit to Wisconsin, and I took occasion while there to inquire into the coal situation. I had received a good many communications from there. We find that here the weeks and months are slipping by, and almost in the entire State of Wisconsin, outside of Milwaukee, no beginning, even, has been made to supply the people with coal. Coal is there unmined and lying in the mines. It is lying at the mouth of the mines and is not being moved. Here we are approaching the middle of August. In four or five weeks from now, for instance, in Wisconsin we are going to have frost. The people begin to heat their houses sometimes the latter part of September and the beginning of October.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HUSTING. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that, so far as the Rocky Mountain region is concerned, we have in Colorado 371,000,000,000 tons of coal which we can not touch; that Wyoming has 449,000,000,000 tons of coal which we can not touch. If we could have a bill passed such as we have proposed and agreed upon in the Committee on Public Lands, we would get that coal land developed, and that would obviate the great monopoly that has been created by the withdrawal of those lands.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin will suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2477) to authorize the construction of a building for the use of the Treasury Department.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I am authorized by the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] to state that his colleague, who is in charge of the unfinished business on the floor of the Senate, is necessarily absent, and I request that it be temporarily laid aside. Then, Mr. President, if that is done——

Mr. HUSTING. I believe I still have the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognized the Senator from Oregon. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did not intend to be rude to the Senator. I supposed that when the unfinished business was laid before the Senate it would cut out the discussion of the bill which had been under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was not aware that the Senator from Wisconsin wished to proceed.

Mr. HUSTING. I meant to occupy the floor.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I submit the question to the Chair as to whether that would not displace the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is before the Senate. Is there objection to laying the unfinished business aside?

Mr. HUSTING. I object. I did not yield for that purpose. I wish to conclude my remarks, which I will do in about 10 minutes. Then I will yield to the Senator from Oregon for the purpose of making his motion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understand that comes up automatically.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. HUSTING. I do not understand that merely laying the unfinished business before the Senate deprives a Senator who had the floor from occupying the floor and concluding his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does not. The Chair asks the pardon of the Senator from Wisconsin. When the Senate adjourned on Thursday the roll call on the passage of the bill developed the absence of a quorum and the roll call should proceed.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I thought that was allowed to go over.

Mr. NORRIS. I make the point of order that since the roll call developed that there was no quorum the unfinished business is debatable, and the Senator from Wisconsin can proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the expert parliamentarians at the desk that it is not debatable. The Chair is so advised.

Mr. NORRIS. The roll call disclosed that there was not a quorum present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HUSTING. The "Senator from Wisconsin" refuses to yield at the present time to anyone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut rises to a parliamentary inquiry. He will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senate having adjourned in the midst of a roll call, which showed the lack of a quorum, and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], in charge of the bill, having stated through his colleague that he would like to have it temporarily laid aside, can we not get unanimous consent that it shall be laid aside without prejudice and that the roll call shall be proceeded with when it is taken up again?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to lay aside the unfinished business informally. Is there objection?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Without prejudice, so that the roll call may go on when the bill is next taken up.

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to make the point of no quorum before that is done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota suggests the absence of a quorum?

Mr. GRONNA. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hollis	Myers	Smoot
Bankhead	Husting	New	Sterling
Beckham	James	Newlands	Stone
Borah	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Sutherland
Brady	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Trammell
Brandegee	Kellogg	Page	Underwood
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Phelan	Vardaman
Culberson	Kenyon	Pittman	Wadsworth
Cummins	King	Poindexter	Warren
Curtis	Knox	Ransdell	Watson
Fletcher	La Follette	Shafroth	Weeks
France	Lewis	Sheppard
Gronna	McKellar	Sherman
Hitchcock	McNary	Smith, S. C.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] on official business. I will let this announcement stand for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside? There being none, the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside.

Mr. HUSTING. I understand that the Senator from Oregon desires to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 4961, and I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That was my purpose.

Mr. HUSTING. I yield the floor. I will conclude my remarks on some other day.

AMERICAN ACADEMY OF ENGINEERS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. This morning I was addressing the Chair to ask the consideration of a Judiciary Committee report, to which I think there will be no opposition, and was cut off by the Chair announcing that the morning business was closed. The Senator from Oregon has kindly yielded to me to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (S. 2360) to incorporate the American Academy of Engineers. I think there will be no debate about it. If there is, I shall not press it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill indicated by him.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 5, to change the name "Backeland" to "Baekeland"; on page 2, line 9, to change the name "Nordbert" to "Nordberg"; in line 22, after the word "Missouri," to strike out the semicolon and insert a comma and the word "and"; in the same line, after the words "New York," to strike out the semicolon and insert a comma and the word "and"; in line 23, after the word "chosen," to insert "be, and they"; and on page 4, line 9, after the word "property," to insert "to an amount not exceeding $1,000,000 in the aggregate," so as to make the bill read:

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that the report of the committee and the letter which I send to the desk from the Secretary of War recommending the bill be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Connecticut that the report and the letter of the Secretary of War be incorporated in the RECORD? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[S. Rept. No. 86, 65th Cong., 1st sess.]

AMERICAN ACADEMY OF ENGINEERS.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report to accompany Senate bill 2360:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2360) to incorporate the American Academy of Engineers, having had the same under consideration, report thereon with the recommendation that it be amended as follows, and as thus amended it be passed:

The incorporation of the American Academy of Engineers was earnestly recommended by Gen. George W. Goethals, Dr. S. W. Stratton, director of the Bureau of Standards, and many other expert engineers and scientists.

Among many reasons given in favor of the passage of the bill were the following, submitted in writing to the Judiciary Committees of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, signed by J. A. L. Waddell, one of the most distinguished consulting engineers of the country:

REASONS WHY THE AMERICAN ACADEMY OF ENGINEERS NEEDS A NATIONAL CHARTER, AND WHAT IT COULD DO FOR THE COUNTRY TO-DAY WERE IT PROPERLY ACCREDITED.

First. Without such a charter the academy would not be recognized by people in general as the national association of engineers chosen from every line of technics, nor as the select body of practitioners which it is intended to be, and therefore its capacity for doing good would be most effectually curtailed.

Second. The National Academy of Sciences exists by reason of a charter from the United States Government, conferred during the period of the Civil War, and as the American Academy of Engineers is to work hand in hand with that organization it must be on a par with it in every respect.

Third. The great and noted European academies are chartered by the governments of the countries wherein they exist, and it would not be well to have the United States of America drop behind the European countries in respect to such an important matter as academies composed of the most prominent men in the various lines of activity.

Fourth. If the American Academy of Engineers were given a national charter, all the technical societies of this country would look to it as the leader in matters relating to the general welfare of engineers of all classes and would appeal to it for help in their important difficulties.

Fifth. If the American Academy of Engineers were to receive a national charter the United States Government would, as a matter of course, turn to it for expert aid and advice, and such would always be given—often after consultation with some of the other engineering societies from among the prominent members of which the members of the academy have been chosen. In case of such an appeal it would be the bounden duty of the academy, according to the pledge given in the bill asking for a national charter, to supply the information or advice requested, and with the least possible delay. Were the academy not so chartered, it would have the right, like any other of the existing technical societies, to ignore the request if it should see fit.

Sixth. Unless the academy be granted a national charter the State and municipal governments of the country will not feel that they have the privilege of appealing to it for information and advice, which they would assuredly have according to the proposed bill of incorporation.

Seventh. Foreign nations sometimes desire to send to America for expert technical aid, and at present they do not know to whom to appeal. Were our academy a national organization, they would invariably apply to it. There exists an excellent example of this at the present moment. There is a French commission now in our country seeking for expert engineers to aid in the reconstruction of France after the war, and they did not know to whom to apply. Fortunately they fell into the hands of Dr. Mailloux, one of the most enthusiastic members of our new academy and an engineer well known in France, and he has helped them as much as any individual could. Had the academy been duly recognized as a national body, these Frenchmen would certainly have gone to it at the outset and would have benefited by its organized aid.

Eighth. France is now contemplating the establishment of a national academy of engineers and is looking to our academy for help and guidance; but if the French engineers do not receive such aid on account of our failure to become a national organization they will soon proceed without us, and then this country will not have the credit of having been the first nation to recognize officially engineering as a great and learned profession, and to France will go the honor of having been the first country in the world to establish an academy of engineers. France has hitherto taken the lead of all the nations in matters of this kind; hence this is a unique opportunity for the United States of America to score an important advance in the history of science and technology, because the establishment of a national academy of engineers will be by far the most important step in the direction of progress and general recognition which the engineering profession has ever taken in any land.

Ninth. Were the academy recognized as a truly national organization, it very properly could take the initiative in many important movements affecting the welfare of the Commonwealth; while, otherwise, its members could not do so with any effect. At the present moment it is a matter of deep regret to many of the members of our nucleus of 50 that we are not properly organized and formally recognized by the American Government; for, if we were, we would at once make officially a stirring appeal through the press to the youths who are about to enter college (and to their parents as their advisers), to the effect that, if at all fitted for technics, they study engineering in some of its numerous branches. We would state that the larger part of the civilized world will have to be reconstructed after the war; that such reconstruction is almost exclusively the work of engineers; that the European engineers are being killed off by thousands; that the technical schools of all the warring countries other than ours have practically been out of business for three years, thus cutting down almost to zero the supply of new men for the profession; that the call to arms in this country will have reduced to about one-half the attendance at the technical schools (while instead of being halved it ought to be doubled); that all the youths between 16 and 21 who have any special aptitude for mathematics or mechanical work, and who are intending to take a college course, can best serve their country in its hour of need by entering technical schools; that all students of such institutions should remain there, if possible, until graduation; and that engineering for the next 10 years, at least, is going to be the most lucrative of all the professions.

It is true that such an appeal as the one just suggested might readily be made by the old and well-established Society for the Promotion of Engineering Education; but, if so, it would generally fall upon deaf ears, because it would immediately be remarked that the professors were simply trying to recruit their classes and were "rooting" for their schools.

If, though, a duly organized and accredited academy of engineers were to make such an appeal, the Nation would immediately take notice and would need seriously the words of warning from a select body of the most practical men of America.

For these reasons, and for other important ones too numerous to mention herein, it is advisable that the bills before the Senate and House of Representatives to incorporate the American Academy of Engineers be considered as dealing with an important "war measure," and that the said measure be passed without delay.

Respectfully submitted.

J. A. L. WADDELL,
Consulting Engineer and Member of the American Academy of Engineers.

The following letters furnish other arguments in favor of the incorporation of this academy:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,

Washington, June 23, 1917.

Hon. FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
Committee on the Judiciary,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I beg to introduce to you Dr. J. A. L. Waddell, a charter member of the American Academy of Engineers.

The bill to incorporate the academy is now before the Committee on the Judiciary, and the objects of the organization are fully set forth therein. Section 5 of the measure provides "That the American Academy of Engineers shall, whenever called upon by any department or establishment of the Government, investigate, examine, experiment, and report upon any subject of engineering science or art," etc.

The academy is endeavoring to organize at this time, with the expectation that it can be of service in technical matters during the war. It is hoped, therefore, that the bill may be classified among the legislation having a bearing upon the war to be considered at this session.

Any assistance or advice that you may give Dr. Waddell to promote the object he has in view will be appreciated.

Very truly, yours,

GEO. W. GOETHALS.

Senator FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR BRANDEGEE: I take great pleasure in calling your attention to H. R. 4625, for the purpose of incorporating the American Academy of Engineers.

This measure provides for the establishment of a body of representative engineers upon whom the Government may call for advice in time of need. The members named in the bill as the incorporators are well known as leaders in their respective professions. It is my opinion that this body would be of great service to the Government at all times in an advisory capacity as regards its engineering work both in the military and civil departments. With kindest regards, I remain,

Very truly, yours,

S. W. STRATTON.

NEW YORK, July 5, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I desire respectfully to call your attention to Senate bill 2360, the purpose of which is to incorporate a national body of engineers, which is already organized under the name of the American Academy of Engineers.

I would like to urge the importance and desirability of the Senate and Congress of the United States giving a national charter to the American Academy of Engineers at the earliest date possible. Besides the reasons of professional, national, and civic character, which amply justify the formation of the American Academy of Engineers, and which will probably be urged in letters addressed to you by other engineers on this subject, there are other reasons which make the movement extremely opportune at the present time. While I was in France last fall with the American Industrial Commission to France, of which I was a member, I had occasion several times to speak of this matter to many men prominent in engineering, applied science, and technology, including members of the French Academie des Sciences. Many compliments were paid to the American engineering profession for its foresight and its initiative in having inaugurated a movement for the creation of an academy of engineers. The fact was recognized and was stated by them, in so many words, that the time has come when academies of engineers are necessary for the further and fuller development and evolution of the engineering profession as a factor in human progress. I was informed that, notwithstanding the fact that France already has the greatest academy of sciences in the world, the need has been recognized for something more.

The French Government has, since the war began, created a new academy called the Academy of Agriculture by a special decree of President Poincaré, issued under date of February 23, 1915, and countersigned by the minister of agriculture. This academy succeeds, and is based upon, the National Agricultural Society of France, founded in 1761. In the last two years efforts have been made to constitute in France a federation of engineers, architects, and technologists with the idea of securing a better coordination of, and cooperation between, the different branches of applied science. Strange, but very important to note, men like my friend Prof. Blondel, the distinguished electrical engineer and scientist, who is himself a member of the Académie des Sciences, and consequently is a member of the Institut de France, was one of the very first to recognize the fact that there is still something lacking in France to enable the French nation and Government to derive the fullest benefit and highest efficiency from the cooperation of technical men. He expressed to me the fervent hope that the American academy would soon be completely launched and established, because he fully believed that the example would be at once followed by the men interested in and connected with engineering and applied science in France. He expressed wonder that this happy idea, which he characterizes as an inspiration, had not been carried into execution long ago, especially in view of the fact that engineering and the work of engineers have assumed so much importance in modern life and in present day activities, in warfare as well as in industry and commerce. A prominent French engineer told me that he wished that the idea of establishing a national academy of engineers had been thought of in France first instead of in America. However, under the circumstances as France could not be the first, it would rather play second and come after America than after any other nation. He added laconically that there was one nation that might have been first, and which it would have been impossible for them to follow, as a matter of self-respect and dignity. In France the creation of an academy of engineers is regarded as a war measure of considerable importance and seeing that the example is being set by America, France will be sure to follow it promptly and enthusiastically. A letter received from M. Blondel, under date of May 25, reiterates his great interest in the movement to establish the American Academy of Engineers, and congratulates American engineers on having organized that academy.

The preceding notes show that the men of elite in engineering and applied science in France have the highest opinion of the American Academy of Engineers, and realize that its creation is fully justified. Their indorsement alone, in my opinion, constitutes a strong plea in favor of the prompt passage of the bills introduced in the Senate and the House of Representatives to incorporate that academy. I need not dwell upon the numerous other reasons related to the benefits which the profession of engineering in general and the Nation as a whole can and will undoubtedly derive from the American Academy of Engineers. In France academies can be created by presidential decree on the recommendation of one of the ministers. I sincerely hope that the Senate and House of Representatives will not delay in taking the action desired by the charter members of the American Academy of Engineers, so that the said academy may not be deprived of the credit and satisfaction of having been the first academy of engineers to receive official sanction as a national academy of engineers.

Yours, very truly,

C. O. MAILLOUX.

ENGINEERING DEPARTMENT,
Nashville, Tenn., June 25, 1917.

Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
Member of the United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The world war which is now in progress is principally a contest between engineers. Those of Germany are united in one great body for the welfare of the fatherland. This body is an important factor in the nation's affairs both in peace and war, and the organization enjoys Government recognition and confidence.

The engineers of this country are not represented by one authoritative body, nor can they succeed in forming such an organization which would be effective until a national charter is secured.

There are at least 200,000 engineers in this country who are interested in securing a plan for united action in the most positive and effective way. Such a plan is no doubt a very important war measure. To put into effect a bill, known as House bill 4625, has been introduced in Congress, which provides for a national charter for the American Academy of Engineers. The bill shows the names of the charter members. These were selected by a committee of 10 engineers, which was chosen by Gen. Goethals.

In behalf of the entire engineering profession and the welfare of the Nation, I solicit your earnest support of this bill for passage at the present session.

Very respectfully,

HUNTER MCDONALD,
Past President, American Society of Civil Engineers,
Charter Member American Academy of Engineers.

AMERICAN ACADEMY OF ENGINEERS,
Washington, May 3, 1917.

To the honorable Members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives of the United States of America.

GENTLEMEN: The engineers named hereon were chosen from the various branches of the profession for the purpose of forming an American Academy of Engineers.

The objects of the proposed organization are set forth in the draft of a proposed act of Congress accompanying this, showing that the academy is to be absolutely nonpartisan. Its aims are to be: First, to render loyal and effective service to the Government of the United States, as far as lies in its power; second, to advance in every legitimate manner the interests and welfare of the engineering profession in all of its numerous branches.

While the establishment of the proposed academy has been under discussion for nearly eight years, the final steps necessary to its materialization were not taken until December, 1916. The mode of selection of the nucleus then adopted was as follows:

By the written request of many engineers from all parts of the country to the effect that he take the first step toward the inauguration of the academy, Hon. William C. Redfield, Secretary of Commerce, requested Maj. Gen. George W. Goethals to select nine prominent engineers (mostly from among the past presidents of the various national engineering societies) who, with himself, should choose from America's most eminent representatives of all branches of engineering some 40 others, the 50 thus constituted to be the incorporators and first members of the American Academy of Engineers, and petition Congress for a national charter.

Gen. Goethals complied, but refrained from including himself among the 10 whom he selected. This small nucleus, after insisting that Gen. Goethals be included as the first member elected, chose (by a most careful manner of selection extended over a number of conferences) the other members required to make up the 50 whose names appear on the succeeding page.

You are most earnestly requested to pass this proposed legislation with the least possible delay in order that the American Academy of Engineers may be able to serve our beloved country in her present hour of need and against the attacks and machinations of a foreign foe.

We trust that you will let nothing prevent you from granting this request.

Respectfully submitted.

THE COMMITTEE OF ORGANIZATION,
CHARLES F. CHANDLER,
Temporary Chairman.
CHARLES F. RAND,
Temporary Secretary.

JULY 24, 1917.

Hon. WARREN GARD,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. GARD: I have your letter of July 20, and have looked over the papers inclosed. In the meantime, Gen. Goethals writes me that at the request of the Secretary of Commerce he took the first steps toward the inauguration of the American Academy of Engineers, and that he and Secretary Redfield have given serious consideration to the project. I do not know two men whose judgment upon such a matter I would value more highly, and I am very happy to concur in the opinion which they have expressed. Surely such a body would be very useful to the Government in times of emergency, and the provisions of section 5 of the proposed charter insure that cooperation.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER, Secretary of War.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House agrees to the report of the commmittee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1816) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2356) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION—CONFERENCE REPORT (S. DOC. NO. 72).

Mr. NEWLANDS. I submit the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1816) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes. I ask that the report lie on the table and be printed. I desire to give notice that I shall call up the report for consideration at the earliest opportunity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). The conference report will lie on the table and be printed.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill S. 1816, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

"That section 24 of an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be further amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 24. That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby enlarged so as to consist of nine members, with terms of seven years, and each shall receive $10,000 compensation annually. The qualifications of the members and the manner of the payment of their salaries shall be as already provided by law. Such enlargement of the commission shall be accomplished through appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of two additional Interstate Commerce Commissioners, one for a term expiring December 31, 1921, and one for a term expiring December 31, 1922. The terms of the present commissioners, or of any successor appointed to fill a vacancy caused by the death or resignation of any of the present commissioners, shall expire as heretofore provided by law. Their successors and the successors of the additional commissioners herein provided for shall be appointed for the full term of seven years, except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he shall succeed. Not more than five commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party.

"SEC. 2. That section 17 of said act, as amended, be further amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 17. That the commission may conduct its proceedings in such manner as will best conduce to the proper dispatch of business and to the ends of justice. The commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed. Any member of the commission may administer oaths and affirmations and sign subpœnas. A majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, except as may be otherwise herein provided, but no commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he has any pecuniary interest. The commission may, from time to time, make or amend such general rules or orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of proceedings before it, or before any division of the commission, including forms of notices and the service thereof, which shall conform, as nearly as may be, to those in use in the courts of the United States. Any party may appear before the commission or any division thereof and be heard in person or by attorney. Every vote and official act of the commission, or of any division thereof, shall be entered of record, and its proceedings shall be public upon the request of any party interested.

"'The commission is hereby authorized by its order to divide the members thereof into as many divisions as it may deem necessary, which may be changed from time to time. Such divisions shall be denominated, respectively, division 1, division 2, etc. Any commissioner may be assigned to and may serve upon such division or divisions as the commission may direct, and the senior in service of the commissioners constituting any of said division shall act as chairman thereof. In case of vacancy in any division, or of absence or inability to serve thereon of any commissioner thereto assigned, the chairman of the commission, or any commissioner designated by him for that purpose, may temporarily serve on said division until the commission shall otherwise order.

"'The commission may by order direct that any of its work, business, or functions arising under this act, or under any act amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, or under any amendment which may be made to any of said acts, or under any other act or joint resolution which has been or may hereafter be approved, or in respect of any matter which has been or may be referred to the commission by Congress or by either branch thereof, be assigned or referred to any of said divisions for action thereon, and may by order at any time amend, modify, supplement, or rescind any such direction. All such orders shall take effect forthwith and remain in effect until otherwise ordered by the commission.

"'In conformity with and subject to the order or orders of the commission in the premises, each division so constituted shall have power and authority by a majority thereof to hear and determine, order, certify, report, or otherwise act as to any of said work, business, or functions so assigned or referred to it for action by the commission, and in respect thereof the division shall have all the jurisdiction and powers now or then conferred by law upon the commission, and be subject to the same duties and obligations. Any order, decision, or report made or other action taken by any of said divisions in respect of any matters so assigned or referred to it shall have the same force and effect, and may be made, evidenced, and enforced in the same manner as if made or taken by the commission, subject to rehearing by the commission, as provided in section 16a hereof for rehearing cases decided by the commission. The secretary and seal of the commission shall be the secretary and seal of each division thereof.

"'In all proceedings before any such divisions relating to the reasonableness of rates or to alleged discriminations not less than three members shall participate in the consideration and decision; and in all proceedings relating to the valuation of railway property under the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, by providing for a valuation of the several classes of property of carriers, subject thereto and securing information concerning their stocks, bonds, and other securities," approved March 1, 1913, not less than five members shall participate in the consideration and decision.

"'The salary of the secretary of the commission shall be $5,000 per annum.

"'Nothing in this section contained or done pursuant thereto shall be deemed to divest the commission of any of its powers.'

"SEC. 3. So much of section 18 of the act to regulate commerce as fixes the salary of the secretary of the commission is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 4. That paragraph 2, section 15, of the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be further amended by adding the following: 'Provided further, Until January 1, 1920, no increased rate, fare, charge, or classification shall be filed except after approval thereof has been secured from the commission. Such approval may, in the discretion of the commission, be given without formal hearing, and in such case shall not affect any subsequent proceeding relative to such rate, fare, charge, or classification.'"

And the House agree to the same.

I give notice that I shall call up the report for consideration at the first opportunity. I ask that the report be received and printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report will lie on the table and be printed.

The report is as follows:

"That section 1 of the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, be further amended by adding thereto the following:

"'That on and after the approval of this act any person or persons who shall, during the war in which the United States is now engaged, knowingly and willfully, by physical force or intimidation by threats of physical force obstruct or retard, or aid in obstructing or retarding, the orderly conduct or movement in the United States of interstate or foreign commerce, or the orderly make-up or movement or disposition of any train, or the movement or disposition of any locomotive, car, or other vehicle on any railroad or elsewhere in the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and for every such offense shall be punishable by a fine of not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment for not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized, whenever in his judgment the public interest requires, to employ the armed forces of the United States to prevent any such obstruction or retardation of the passage of the mail, or of the orderly conduct or movement of interstate or foreign commerce in any part of the United States, or of any train, locomotive, car, or other vehicle upon any railroad or elsewhere in the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect either section 6 or section 20 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

"'That during the continuance of the war in which the United States is now engaged the President is authorized, if he finds it necessary for the national defense and security, to direct that such traffic or such shipments of commodities as, in his judgment, may be essential to the national defense and security shall have preference or priority in transportation by any common carrier by railroad, water, or otherwise. He may give these directions at and for such times as he may determine, and may modify, change, suspend, or annul them, and for any such purpose he is hereby authorized to issue orders direct, or through such person or persons as he may designate for the purpose or through the Interstate Commerce Commission. Officials of the United States, when so designated, shall receive no compensation for their services rendered hereunder. Persons not in the employ of the United States so designated shall receive such compensation as the President may fix. Suitable offices may be rented and all necessary expenses, including compensation of persons so designated, shall be paid as directed by the President out of funds which may have been or may be provided to meet expenditures for the national security and defense. The common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce or as many of them as desire so to do are hereby authorized without responsibility or liability on the part of the United States, financial or otherwise, to establish and maintain in the city of Washington during the period of the war an agency empowered by such carriers as join in the arrangement to receive on behalf of them all notice and service of such orders and directions as may be issued in accordance with this act, and the service upon such agent shall be good service as to all the carriers joining in the establishment thereof. And it shall be the duty of any and all the officers, agents, or employees of such carriers by railroad or water or otherwise to obey strictly and conform promptly to such orders, and failure knowingly and willfully to comply therewith, or to do or perform whatever is necessary to the prompt execution of such order, shall render such officers, agents, or employees guilty of a misdemeanor, and any such officer, agent, or employee shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court. For the transportation of persons or property in carrying out the orders and directions of the President, just and reasonable rates shall be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and if the transportation be for the Government of the United States, it shall be paid for currently or monthly by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any funds not otherwise appropriated. Any carrier complying with any such order or direction for preference or priority herein authorized shall be exempt from any and all provisions in existing law imposing civil or criminal pains, penalties, obligations, or liabilities upon carriers by reason of giving preference or priority in compliance with such order or direction.'"

CONSERVATION OF FOOD—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Oregon to yield to me because I know the Senator is about to make a motion that would cut off the opportunity to say what I want to say. I ask that this conference report may go over until Monday. The report is brought here this morning for the first time. Informally the report was put into the RECORD. It was not understood, I think, generally in the Senate that the bill would be taken up to-day.

I secured late yesterday what was said to be a confidential print of the bill. I did not have time to give it a thorough examination. I have not up to this time had the opportunity to give the conference report anything like a complete and careful study. I have gone into it far enough, however, to be thoroughly convinced that new matter of the most radical character has been introduced into the bill in conference, that some of the changes are so radical as to make the bill much more extreme than it was when it first came to the Senate from the House of Representatives, and to become convinced further that every essential amendment put into the bill by the Senate has been nullified by the conferees. Yet my impression may in part be a mistake, because, as I have said, I have not had an opportunity to study the bill.

There is only left of this afternoon, until 5 o'clock, an hour and 45 minutes' working time. The Committee on Military Affairs, of which the distinguished Senator in charge of the bill is chairman, has a meeting arranged for 5 o'clock this afternoon to inspect some new machinery connected with the war. I should like to have the opportunity of attending that investigation and inspection. I should like to have an opportunity to give this bill study and not be forced to start a discussion when I am in a half-prepared condition. I am very sure, as far as my remarks are concerned, that they can be made much shorter if I am given a little time to prepare what I have to say.

So I hope the conference report on this bill may be laid over until Monday. At that time, as far as I am concerned, I shall be ready to take whatever position I think I ought to take, and it is no part of my purpose to do anything whatsoever to delay the passage of the bill further than to present my views and to do what I can in the way of straightforward debate to try and have the bill sent back to the committee to write, if possible, a few provisions in it that the Senate wants. So I ask that the matter may go over.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I think my colleagues will bear me out when I state that I have during the whole course of the pendency of this measure before the Senate attempted to be reasonable in the matter of requests made by Senators for postponement or for further time to consider the measure in its details. It seems to me that we have reached a time in the discussion of the measure when we ought to speed the bill. The country, whether right or wrong in its feeling as to what may happen after the bill is enacted, is demanding that the Senate act upon it one way or the other, either pass it or defeat it. The administration wants the bill acted upon either one way or the other as a war measure.

The bill has been almost constantly before the Senate since the 18th day of June, six weeks, and it was in conference, where it was put through a severe analysis, from Thursday morning until the following Wednesday morning, when the report was finally agreed upon. There has been no change in it that was not the subject of discussion when the bill was before the Senate.

It seems to me that the Senators who intend to oppose it or who intend to discuss it are just as well prepared to discuss it now as they will be if the report goes over until Monday.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. In view of the statement of the acting chairman that there is nothing in the bill now which was not in the bill when it passed the Senate, may I ask the Senator——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not want to be misunderstood. My statement was not made quite as broadly as that. I say there has been no material change.

Mr. GRONNA. No material change? May I ask the Senator as to the provision on page 14, section 6, which exempts boards of trade and chambers of commerce from the penalty of section 6 and also section 13? Is it not true, in other words, that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon was withdrawn and that that very same amendment is now included in section 6, and of course it is absolutely new matter?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is a new feature; but it was before the Senate at one time, and while it is true it was withdrawn, the substance of it was discussed on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. I think I was the only one who discussed it, and of course I had no opportunity to fully go into the discussion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not recall about it.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator agreed to withdraw it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I did withdraw it.

Mr. GRONNA. And I did not proceed to discuss it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What I desired to say was that the conferees discussed the situation and were more thoroughly advised about it, and taken in connection with other features of the bill it was thought to be safest to put in the portion to which the Senator has called attention.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator will admit, of course, that it is new matter.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely.

Mr. GRONNA. May I call the Senator's attention——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What is the effect of it? Is it an important part?

Mr. GRONNA. It is very important, because it legalizes gambling. That is the effect of it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I differ from the Senator on that. I think I shall be able to show that it does not legalize gambling.

Mr. GRONNA. May I call the Senator's attention to the precedents regarding new matter in a conference report?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am familiar with the rule. The same rule applies in the House, but it was not sought to be availed of in the House. I do not know whether the Senator intends to make a point of order against it or not, but I do not think a point of order will lie against it in the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. I can assure the Senator that I shall make a point of order against it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That can come up later. The proposition now is to take up the report for consideration.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from North Dakota has the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I desire to ask the Senator in charge of the bill whether it is not the fact that weeks before we passed the so-called food-control bill we passed a bill commonly known as the food-survey bill, which had in it many important provisions touching grain exchanges, hoarding of foodstuffs, and so forth. We sent that bill back to the House, where it had originated, with these important amendments, and there it remained for weeks during all the time the present bill was under discussion. Now I understand that the conferees upon that bill have agreed and that their conference report is ready. Is not that the case?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is true. The same question that the Senator is discussing now was discussed three or four times when this bill was before the Senate.

Mr. REED. I understand, but the Senator does not get my thought. I know we have discussed that somewhat remarkable course of conduct, but I am asking——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am not responsible for that.

Mr. REED. I am asking if it is not true that that bill is here in the form of a conference report.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I understand so. I was not one of the conferees, and I do not know.

Mr. REED. And that conference report was agreed to within a few minutes after or before the present conference report was agreed to?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Later.

Mr. REED. A few minutes later. Nevertheless the bill relates to the same subject matter in part as the food-control bill. It was passed by the Senate weeks before. I think that conference report ought to have precedence over this report. I think, as a matter of fairness, it ought to come up first.

I should like to know before I take any action even on voting upon taking up this matter what has become of that other conference report. It was passed before this bill, and weeks before this bill. It was passed under that same lash of haste and the same demand for immediate action that is now being employed in regard to this bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yielded to the Senator for the purpose of suggesting some question, but not to make a speech. If the Senator desires to make an address to the Senate I would rather he would do it in his own time.

Mr. REED. The Senator is about to make a motion that will cut off debate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It will not cut off debate. If the conference report comes up, it can be discussed ad libitum.

Mr. REED. If the Senator makes his motion, I am cut off. I am going to make this suggestion, and then, of course, the Senator will proceed as he thinks he ought. If the Senator makes his motion to proceed to the consideration of the report, that question is not debatable.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. REED. If I am in error——

Mr. HOLLIS. After 2 o'clock a motion to take up a bill for consideration is debatable.

Mr. REED. Very well, I was in error. If the Senator wishes to make his motion, I will make my remarks in my own time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The motion I made was that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on House bill 4961. The question is on the motion. [Putting the question.]

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I ask the Senator from Missouri would it be agreeable to him that if this report is taken up we have something of an understanding that the particular matter to which he wishes to address himself shall not be taken up to-day, but that the other matter, in which there are many details, I understand, be made the subject of discussion to-day; that the matter which he wishes delayed will not be taken up to-day, but, nevertheless, that the part of the day be occupied in other matters, so as to consume such time as we could on uncontroverted subjects.

Mr. REED. There would hardly be any reason to consume time on uncontroverted subjects.

Mr. LEWIS. There are some subjects, I am told, that are uncontroverted, as to mere differences as to method of application, and there are many Senators who desire to express themselves as to those changes; they do not oppose the subject matter itself, but merely the method in which it is to be applied. This is my thought, without desiring to draw my eminent friend into technical distinctions. Would it be satisfactory to him that the matter in which he is interested go over? Would the fact that we discussed to-day other matters in which the Senator is not interested at all embarrass his viewpoint or interfere at all with the plan or method he may have; that as far as we could agree to take the bill up and still forego the discussion of the matter in which he desires further time he might consent? That was my object.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in view of what my eminent and distinguished friend says, I would move for a more specific statement, because I really do not quite understand what the Senator is trying to make plain to me. Of course I know the deficiency is on my part and not on his, because everyone knows that the Senator from Illinois could not express an idea except in very plain terms.

Mr. LEWIS. I myself must concede there is some ground for a motion for a bill of particulars.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Illinois that there might not be anything in the bill the Senator from Missouri would not object to.

Mr. REED. Oh, no. The Senator ought not to have made that remark. The Senator from Illinois was not ungenerous enough to make it. The Senator from Illinois said there were matters in connection with the bill in which he thought I was not particularly interested. Now I yield to the Senator to conclude his interrogatory, and then I shall say what I have to say.

Mr. LEWIS. Simply, I was informed that there are certain features of the report on which there had been some discussion as to some form of the report, and there was some desire to change the form a little, to make more definite that which is indefinite in its expression. I understood from the Senator from Missouri this morning that there is a larger question he desires time for further preparation on. It occurred to me, sir, that there were some features of the bill which the Senator was not opposing and it could be understood that we would consider those matters he was not opposing and did not wish to be heard upon by postponing the matter upon which he wished to be heard until Monday, and that if reached and it might go over until Monday, that would be satisfactory. That was the proposition suggested.

Mr. PHELAN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. PHELAN. The Chair called for a vote upon taking up the conference report on the food-control bill, but did not declare the result.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is correct. The Senator will pardon the Chair.

Mr. PHELAN. What was the result of that vote?

Mr. REED. If the Chair please, before the result was announced I addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri arose before the Chair had an opportunity to declare the result and addressed the Chair.

Mr. PHELAN. Was it in order to speak when the Chair was putting the question to a vote?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California is technically correct, but owing to the situation as it then presented itself, the Chair relaxed the rule a little bit for the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. If the Chair please, I shall not ask the relaxation of any rule of the Senate, but, as the Chair knows, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] made his motion, and the Senator from Missouri was actually on his feet waiting to address himself to that motion; all of which the Senate well knew. The Chair started to put the motion rather quickly, and I addressed the Chair. The Chair evidently, however, did not hear me and did actually start to put the question; but, as usually happens, when the Chair did hear me, the Chair arrested the proceedings in order to give me an opportunity to be heard, for all of which I thank the Chair; and for the very generous position of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], I thank him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on taking up the conference report.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, I desire to be heard, and in all earnestness.

We had presented to us many weeks ago a food-survey bill. We were told that upon the prompt passage of that food-survey bill depended to a large extent the successful conduct of the war. We set aside other business and proceeded to a consideration of that bill. The bill reached the Senate May 29, was on the same day referred to the committee, and was reported back to the Senate May 31. In response to the demand which was made that the bill should be immediately passed, the Senate, without taking the ordinary time for consideration, proceeded to amend the bill, and sent it back to the other House on June 2. When it reached the House, by direct interference from the outside, it was held up in conference until after the food-control bill had been agreed upon by the conferees. The chief arguments made in favor of the swift passage of the food-survey bill were that the bill was intended, first, to encourage crop production during the present year; second, to stop gambling operations upon the great grain exchanges of the country; third, to prevent the hoarding of necessities by selfish and evil-minded persons.

Mr. President, that bill has at last been released by the conferees and is now before this Chamber. It was passed more than eight weeks before the food-control bill. The food-control bill when it left the Senate had in it certain provisions which were taken literally from the food-survey bill. We ought, in all fairness and in all justice to ourselves, in my humble judgment, to first take up the food-survey bill. Let us understand what is left of it; let us understand what changes have been made in it; let us know in just what condition it is and what the final disposition may be of that bill. When that has been done, let us take up the food-control bill that passed the Senate eight weeks after the food-survey bill had passed the Senate. I insist that in the orderly procedure we ought to take up the food-survey bill. I do not know why juggling with that bill has been tolerated. I understand the conference report on the food-survey bill has been presented, and I think we ought to take up the report on that bill and know what is in it before we proceed with the consideration of the conference report on the food-control bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the conference report. The ayes have it.

Mr. REED. Do we have a negative vote sometimes in the Senate, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair begs the Senator's pardon. The noes will now be received. The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the call for the yeas and nays by the Senator from Missouri sustained? It is not. The ayes have it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not think Senators understood the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question again.

Mr. REED. I protest that the Members of the Senate should be given an opportunity to put up their hands. We certainly are entitled to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Well, the Chair will again put the question. Those who desire the yeas and nays will indicate it in the usual manner. [A pause.] The call is refused. The Secretary will read the conference report.

Mr. REED. I protest that the call was seconded, and I shall continue to so protest.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report is the subject matter before the Senate.

The Secretary proceeded to read the conference report.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will please state it.

Mr. GRONNA. I gave notice a moment ago that I should move to have this bill recommitted to the committee because of the new matter inserted in the conference report.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. GRONNA. I think I may say that the Senator from Oregon agrees that there is new matter in the report. My inquiry is, Will it be in order at this time to make the motion to recommit the bill? I call the attention to the Chair to page 123 of Precedents: Decisions on Points of Order in the United States Senate, compiled by Mr. Henry H. Gilfry, and I want to read——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. GRONNA. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was just going to suggest to the Senator that he let the conference report be read first and then make his point after the report has been read.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, my inquiry is, Will it be in order after the conference report has been read to make the point of order that new matter has been inserted and that the committee has exceeded its authority? In this connection I desire to refer to the decision of the Vice President [Mr. MARSHALL], on October 9, 1914, where the Vice President states:

> The Chair thinks it would have the effect of rejecting the conference report; that the conference report would go back to the conferees with a statement upon the part of the Senate that the conferees had exceeded their authority and had introduced new matter into the report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair responds to the interrogatory of the Senator from North Dakota by saying that a point of order is in order at this time, and the Chair will hear it if the Senator wishes to state it.

Mr. GRONNA. Will the point of order be in order after the conference report has been read, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be made at that time.

Mr. GRONNA. Then I have no objection to having the report read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the report.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the report, which will be found in the proceedings of the Senate of Thursday last, and was interrupted by Mr. REED. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I see no occasion to consume the time of the Senate in the formal reading of this report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the further reading will be dispensed with.

Mr. REED. I suggest that the reading of the report is merely a useless consumption of the time of the Senate, and I have no objection to its being dispensed with.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I have no objection to the reading of the report being waived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to dispensing with the further reading of the conference report? The Chair hears no objection. The question now is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am going to say now to the Presiding Officer in all kindliness that I trust his impetuosity will not lead him to undertake to put questions so fast that we who are slower and more deliberate in method will be deprived of an opportunity to be heard. I have been a Member of the Senate for six years, and I have always thought that one of the things most to be admired here was the entire spirit of fairness exhibited by the Members of the Senate toward each other and the disposition on the part of the Presiding Officer always to accord to Senators the fullest opportunity to be heard. It will be the occasion of very profound regret if the time ever comes when Senators shall feel that it is necessary to be standing upon their feet shouting at the top of their voices in order to obtain recognition or to resort to any of the other methods which have sometimes disgraced political caucuses. I think we can all afford to take time to bring to every question not only consideration but courtesy and some degree of forbearance.

There is never a time when calmness is so necessary as in the hour of stress; there is never a time when deliberation is more essential than when great dangers confront a nation. Over in that land of flowers and warriors, Japan, they have what is known as the elder statesmen, a body of men whose natural aptitude and intelligence have been seasoned and ripened in the fields of experience. Those wise old men are supposed to be beyond the reach of excitement, to never respond to mere caprice, to always calmly and intelligently analyze and determine every question. If we have a body of that kind in this country, I presume the honor must be with the Senate. We may not very well fulfill it, but just in proportion as we do we serve our country.

Sometimes recently I have witnessed performances in the Senate which to me seemed to indicate that Senators are losing sight of the fact that the things we are here doing are a part of the world history, a part of the great world tragedy; that instead of looking at the vast panorama now passing before us and in part controlled by us, we are thinking of petty personal aggrandizement, of personal success, of political considerations. I have heard statesmen say, "Well, what is the use; the thing is going to be done anyway, and, therefore, why should I protest my judgment?" Another will say, "Well, what is the use; some people have written me letters from my district that they favor the measure, and why should I not look after my own affairs?" Asked if the people to whom they refer as having expressed themselves are writing only in response to a propaganda originating in Washington and financed by the taxpayers' money, they reply that they do not know; but nevertheless they yield. Again, statesmen sent to represent sovereign States of the Union, with millions of constituents, will say, "I know the measure is unwise; I deem the measure hurtful; but are we not at war, and therefore do not all rules of reason disappear?" Again—and here I speak of a somewhat numerous class—you find those who exclaim, "Put the responsibility upon the President, and if there be failure it will be the President's fault."

Ah, my fellow Senators, we can not do that if we would. There is but one way in which we can escape our obligations, and that is, sirs, to resign our offices and turn back our powers to those who sent us here. For we are here the trustees of an express trust, sworn faithfully to administer it as God shall give us light. We can no more put aside that trust than we can put aside the obligations which the God of nature put in the soul of man when He created man.

What is this Government? Is it here in the Senate Chamber? I deny it. Is it yonder in the House of Representatives? I deny it. Is it in the Supreme Court? I deny it. Is it in the executive department? I deny it. The government of this country, the power of this country, every whit of it, is in the sovereign people of the United States. That sovereign people wrote a Constitution which is their Constitution. They created it. They gave it life. They alone can set it aside. They alone can alter its sacred clauses. It is their Constitution, and in it they circumscribed the powers of their agents. In it they fixed the responsibilities of their servants. They gave to the Executive certain powers and obligations. They gave to the Supreme Court and the judiciary certain powers and obligations. They gave to Congress certain powers and obligations.

If the Supreme Court should seek to transfer its responsibility to Congress, it would betray the people of the United States, and would betray the Constitution the people wrote. If the Executive were to undertake to transfer his powers to Congress, he would betray the people of the United States and betray the Constitution the people wrote. If the Congress were to seek to transfer to the Executive the powers, the obligations, the duties the people reposed in Congress, then has Congress broken faith with the people of the United States and betrayed the Constitution the people wrote in blood and in tears.

You can not escape your responsibility. You can gain nothing by saying, "I pass over to another the responsibility." By so doing you betray the power and the authority the people reposed in you. By so doing you become the assassins of the Constitution you are sworn to protect.

So far as I am concerned I can look with some pity, if also with contempt, upon the ignorant man who, standing upon a soap box under a red flag, denounces the Constitution of the United States and inveighs against all forms of government; but I can not look with patience upon those who sit in the seats of the mighty and who dare to undertake to pass over to another the responsibilities placed upon them by the solemn covenant of the Constitution.

I regret that I am forced by the impetuosity of the acting chairman, who is in charge of this bill, to address myself to it before I am prepared to speak upon it with that degree of analysis which can only result from careful study. The lash, forever and eternally the lash, is laid across the legislative back. More and more we cringe. More and more we whine and crawl between the legs of those who master us. Always the cry is haste. In six long years I have scarcely failed to hear, on every great measure, the same old cry of haste. "Make haste! for chaos and old night will come if you but wait to give consideration to the change that we demand." It does not make for wise consideration.

I remember when there came, in the very early days of my experience—a brief and sad experience—a bill to reform the banking and currency system. It came here from the House of Representatives. A propaganda either sprang up spontaneously or else was cultivated; I do not know; but all over the United States, from Atlantic to Pacific, every penny-a-liner was at work with pen or pencil demanding the immediate enactment of that law.

Boards of trade were assembled, who passed resolutions in favor of it. Every kind of exchange, even the wicked grain exchanges, assembled and passed demands for its immediate enactment. Petitions rolled in upon us. The telegraph companies reaped a rich harvest from the enormous number of messages that were forwarded, all of them demanding immediate action, all of them demanding, "Stand by the President!" And then the question arose to those charged with the responsibility of considering that bill in committee how they should stand by the President. Should they stand by the President's side as advisers and counselors and helpers, or should they stand behind the President like cowards, shifting the responsibility upon him?

The President had not given to that bill intimate consideration, and could not. The President desired a certain kind of legislation the details of which he could not have gone into. A battle was started, and the question was whether that bill would be heard before a committee in the Senate or whether the House bill should be accepted, as some insisted, and passed without consideration or amendment. Finally the committee opened its doors. The great business men of the country thronged eager for a hearing. College professors came, financial experts came, ordinary business men came, farmers came, and they all brought with them some store of thought and some gold of knowledge. Before our deliberations were half completed the demands of the propagandists became insistent and imperative. "Act now; act on the instant!" was the cry. Finally a Democratic caucus was called to force the hand of the committee to compel it to act.

The people of the country had not read this bill. Those who were supporing it in press and pulpit and on exchanges had not read it. The caucus that met to force the hand of the committee had not considered it. Nevertheless, they assembled to demand haste. However, the caucus listened to reason and the committee secured some delay, and what was the result?

It was discovered that the bill as it came to us from the House would have inevitably produced a panic. It was discovered that the bill needed amendment so much that five hundred and ten times was it amended. Even after the bill had gone into conference the Secretary of the Treasury found that many of the contentions of those who had insisted upon time and delay and study were right. Accordingly we found him sending to the conferees most important amendments, asking that even at that late hour they be put into the bill. And yet the bill was rushed through too hastily, as evidenced by the fact that since that time numerous amendments have been offered, coming from the executive department. The pressure back of that bill was like the pressure back of this one. It was a demand—an insistent demand—for immediate action, and the claim was made that the country would go to destruction unless the bill was immediately passed. And yet I think it was 8 months and 16 days from the time the bill was passed before the board was created which was to create the banks which the bill authorized, and not a word any more about haste; not a word any more about the necessity for immediate action.

I do not want to weary you by long pursuing this line of thought, but you know; as I know, that the same insistence has come to us time and time again. We were asked to create a Shipping Board. We were told that unless that were done upon the instant the gravest trouble would transpire. The bill creating a Shipping Board was passed—I have forgotten the date. Can some Senator tell me?

Mr. SMOOT. September 7, 1916.

Mr. REED. It was passed on September 7, 1916, and yet I do not think the keel has been laid for the first ship. I say that with very great regret.

Again, I remember when that same Shipping Board came here and told us there was certain legislation that must be passed at the last session of Congress. Under whip and spur we proceeded to the consideration of the bill. The flanks of the jaded horse were bloody. Despite all we could do the bill did not get through Congress at that session. Congress adjourned March 4 and was reassembled on April 2. Some of us, eager to be of service and save the country, were informed that the bill was no longer desired. And yet he who had asked for a little consideration but a few days before had been marked as a bad statesman, a sorry Senator, a recalcitrant, possibly an enemy of the Republic.

Again—and I only touch here and there a spot in a road that is travel worn—they came to us with a food-survey bill. This food-survey bill, we were told by the same kind of papers, and the same kind of men, and the same kind of influence, and the same kind of telegrams that we are receiving now or listening to now, was an immediate necessity. We were informed that the farmer was hesitating and waiting, that the Agricultural Department could not set in operation its great machinery, that the productive forces of our Nation were paralyzed, and would so remain until that bill should be passed. As suggested by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], it was to be an antidote for famine, and famine was pictured as upon us. The Agricultural Department painted somber pictures to inflame the imagination of the people, somber pictures of a people about to starve. The House of Representatives were induced, without very much consideration or deliberation, to pass the bill as it had been handed to them. When the bill reached us we were in a very frenzy of haste.

The bill was rushed from the desk to the committee, and the committee were hastily assembled. The committee hastily read the bill and as hastily reported it back. Ah, if it did not pass at once, if it did not become a law upon the instant, then grim disaster was to fall upon our land; the fields were to be unplowed and unsown; the fertile land was to yield no crops. Everywhere and upon every hand the skeleton forms of the famished people were, if we hesitated a moment, to fall by the wayside in windrows of bones, as in 1846 they fell in famine-cursed Ireland. We passed the bill with breathless speed. Nevertheless, with much fear, we paused to add two or three important amendments.

What were they? We had been told of food gamblers. Mr. Hoover had dealt with that subject and through his press bureau, maintained at Government expense, had alarmed the people; so we passed a very stringent amendment reaching for the food gamblers. We were told that there were wicked hoarders who were keeping back the food from famished mouths, and we could see these wicked men standing back of vast warehouses in which were stored enough to feed the hungry of the earth; and on the other hand stood the pale child with thin, pinched lips that it drew back from the teeth of starvation as it cried for bread. And so we passed an amendment to punish food hoarders. And we sent the beneficent measure for which the world waited back to the House of Representatives within two days' time, whereupon the necessity for immediate action immediately ceased. The vision of starvation vanished. The troop of specters took flight. Into the night of forgetfulness we heard the swish of their vanishing wings. The bill likewise disappeared.

Why was that bill, that had been driven through under whip and spur, held up in the House? I answer, because a Cabinet officer telephoned to a man on the House committee the instructions to hold it up, and to hold it up because if the food-survey bill were passed there would not then be any pressing necessity for passing the food-control bill. If there be a man here who wants to test the accuracy of that statement I invite him to offer a resolution of investigation with authority to summon witnesses and put them upon oath. And so the food-survey bill remained held back, throttled, smothered, sat upon, until this food-dictator bill could be forced through.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator feel that one man in the House was able really to hold back this bill merely because it was suggested by some Cabinet officer?

Mr. REED. I feel that the chairman of the committee of conference was able to do it. At least, the thing was done. Why, conferees were not appointed for nearly four weeks, and then that bill, the food-survey bill, is agreed upon within a few minutes after the Senate conferees surrendered to the House conferees on the food-control bill.

Now, this afternoon, when just a little time is asked—a poor hour and a half of legislative time—in order that Senators may read this bill and give it due consideration, the request is refused. Again the lash of haste, again the cry that speed is all essential; and yet I have no hesitancy in saying now that every moment this legislation is delayed is a moment of blessing to our country and that every moment we hasten it we advance the hour of disaster. That disaster will be great in proportion as the powers granted by the bill are employed and that disaster will be small in proportion as the powers granted by the bill are not employed.

To those more serious matters it is my purpose to call your attention when we meet again, unless, indeed, it is the purpose of the chairman in charge of the bill to compel us to sit all night. I should like to inquire, for my own convenience, whether the Senator intends to allow us to have an adjournment at the usual hour for Saturday afternoon—5 o'clock?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator puts it up to me as though I could control it absolutely. I can not control the Senate. I can only suggest, so far as I am personally concerned, that I feel the Senate ought to take a recess at 5 o'clock.

Mr. REED. So this afternoon, Mr. President, and I very much regret to take the time of the Senate, I want to invite attention for a while to some of the false issues that have thus far been put before the country. I want to show you how this country has been wrought upon and led to insist upon certain action, and how some of the more important of the alleged facts upon which it has acted were all unsound and untrue. I think Senators will find this a little interesting if they will pay me the compliment of their attention.

Mr. Hoover has persistently proclaimed as his chief argument for the creation of a food dictator in the United States that by reason of food dictatorships in Europe the price of foodstuffs in European countries is less than the price in the United States. This statement of Mr. Hoover has been repeated in various forms by Members of the House and by Members of the Senate, and by the press throughout the country, and has been one of the principal levers employed to give strength to the food-control bill. Mr. Hoover's recent utterances show the utter falseness of the claims he has heretofore set up. Let me contrast these statements.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. KNOX. I merely ask the Senator to repeat that statement. I did not get it all.

Mr. REED. My statement is that one of the chief reasons and arguments for the creation of a food dictator is that by reason of food dictatorship, or administration, if you please, in Europe the price of food in European countries is less than the price in the United States.

Mr. President, on June 19, before the Committee on Agriculture—I call attention to Part I, page 10 of the hearings—Mr. Hoover, in a written statement he read to the committee, said:

There can be no more vivid evidence of the desirability of food control in this situation than a comparison between our prices and the prices of foodstuffs in countries where there is some measure of food administration. I will not traverse the prices of all commodities. More to say, as a general fact, the average prices to the consumer are lower in food-controlled countries than in the United States. Practically the entire wheat supply to Belgium is to-day imported from the United States, and, despite the extraordinary costs of transportation, the price of bread is 60 per cent of the price in New York City. A large portion of the wheat of France comes from this country, and yet the price of bread is, again, 40 per cent below our own. In England, where food control was started too late, the price is 30 per cent below our price, and in Canada, again, we see a lower range of prices to the consumer than in our own country, although the producer realizes the same price.

Now, that statement was a clear-cut declaration, particularly when taken in connection with Mr. Hoover's denunciation of food speculators and food gamblers, that in this country by reason of a lack of food regulation we were compelled to pay enormously more than was paid in the countries of Europe where they have the benefit of food regulators or food dictators.

I now call attention to the fact that Mr. Hoover is conducting a publicity bureau at the expense of the United States and that he sends to the papers almost daily enormous quantities of material for which he asks the press to give space. I have here certain of those statements to which I desire now to call particular attention. July 16 he sent out this statement:

[For morning papers of July 17, 1917.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 16, 1917.

Lord Rhonnda, food controller of Great Britain, finds the problem of the food speculator a paramount one, according to information received to-day by Herbert Hoover.

Now, notice as I go through there is not one of these reports sent out by Mr. Hoover that does not mention Mr. Hoover. Just notice the fact in passing. I read on:

Lord Inchcape, chairman of the company owning the steamers carrying frozen meat from Australia to England, has called the attention of the food controller to the effect speculation is having on Australian beef and mutton. These products are loaded on board ship at the Australian ports at 9¾ and 10¼ cents per pound, to which should be added the transportation charges of 2 cents per pound under Government arrangement.

The consumer in England, Lord Inchcape states, is paying from 36 to 48 cents per pound for these meats, and he states that "it would be interesting" to know where the difference goes.

Yet we were told that food prices were lower in Europe, where they had control, than here, and also that there were no speculators over there; they had been done away with. I read further.

On July 21—this is Bulletin No. 125:

[For release for morning papers of July 22, 1917.]
(No. 125.)

FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
PUBLIC INFORMATION DEPARTMENT,
July 21, 1917.

News from London, received to-day, was to the effect that the food controller of Great Britain has been able to modify the order which restricted the use of potatoes to one day a week in hotels, restaurants, and clubs. Potatoes may now be served any day in the week instead of on Friday alone.

Truly their condition must be very delectable. But I read on:

The new order was issued because supplies of new potatoes are increasing, and also for the reason that their use will help conserve bread. It is intimated that at the meals at which potatoes will be permitted to be used bread may be omitted or will be served in reduced quantities.

New potatoes—

This was the 22d day of July—

New potatoes are now selling in London at 8 cents per pound.

Mr. President, that is $4.80 a bushel. On that same day potatoes were selling in the United States at $1.40 a bushel; and yet Mr. Hoover tells us that in food-controlled Europe food is cheaper than it is in the United States!

I read bulletin No. 126, sent out July 29, and to this I invite special attention, because if there is any place where food control has had uninterrupted sway it must be in Germany and Austria-Hungary. Let me read all of this report. As I read it prick up your ears, for the war is already over if Hoover is right.

No. 126. For release for morning papers of July 30, 1917. Food administration, public information department. July 29, 1917—

I hope you will all listen to this, because it is all such cheering news for us—

Reports from Budapest, Hungary, reaching here indicate that the population of the Provinces have been not far from famine conditions. The majority of the people of these Provinces actually live on vegetables, for meat is only for the very rich, and the vegetable supply is seemingly very limited. The country Provinces, in so far as possible, have apparently been drained to supply the needs of the army in the field and the large centers of population where trouble might be feared.

The information received stated that the venders were demanding exorbitant prices for dry wood and withered leaves on the ground that they were vegetables.

Of course I would not believe that at all if it did not come from Mr. Hoover. I would not think that it was possible, but it has the name blown in the bottle and it must be correct.

The information received stated that the venders were demanding exorbitant prices for dry wood and withered leaves, on the ground that they were vegetables. Green peas were selling at $1.45 a kilogram (2¼ pounds).

One dollar and forty-five cents for 2¼ pounds of green peas! Hearken unto me, O ye people who complain about Washington prices! How would you like to pay that at the market in Washington? I read on:

Milk was absolutely not to be had for cream. An unappetizing liquid, which was once skimmed milk, cost 60 cents a pint. There was no butter or cheese. Cherries were 86 cents per pound. The principal stock seemed to consist of dried peas and dried plums. Young chickens were selling at $2.50. In the egg market were found only empty boxes. Potatoes were not to be had.

Conditions as stated by the informant were for June 15. Shortly following that date the authorities sought to arbitrarily fix the price of vegetables at about half the venders were asking.

Now notice what happened in Hungary:

This resulted in a strike, so that in the great market places no foodstuffs were to be had.

Inquiry developed the fact that the venders were selling their foods to Vienna buyers, and the restriction had to be withdrawn.

Thus saith Mr. Hoover.

Postscript. And like a woman's letter the real spirit of the matter is in the postscript:

[For rease for morning papers of Monday, July 30, 1917.]

FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
PUBLIC INFORMATION DEPARTMENT,
July 29, 1917.

(Add or insert Hungarian famine story.)

Cabled press advices from Austria received during the past few days indicate that an even worse condition now prevails. The reports state that lunch can not be purchased in any restaurant for less than $5.

Think of a newspaper reporter's condition over there! Think of the situation in which an ordinary Senator would find himself!

The reports state that lunch can not be purchased in any restaurant for less than $5.

Not even at a Childs restaurant for less than $5.

Three pounds of meat for $5; olive oil, $10 per quart; butter, $5 per pound; and chickens—

Which were quoted in the other circular sent out the same day with the postscript at $2.50 apiece are now quoted as follows:

Chickens at $10 each are some of the prices quoted.

Mr. President, I would not dare read you that article if it came from a newspaper, lest you would at once desire to vote for a censor in order to stop the papers from telling whoppers. I would not think of making that statement upon the credence of any ordinary human being. But, sirs, when I find it vouched for by Mr. Hoover I am bound, however great the mystery or dreadful the story, to exercise that sort of confidence my fathers reposed in the Christian religion, namely, implicit obedience and unlimited faith.

While I am at Austria-Hungary let me take a short excursion into Germany, where they have had a food control beyond compare; where the iron hand of the Kaiser is even powerful enough to evoke the admiration of even a man who wants to be food dictator over a free people. Behold this is the story; coming now from the pen of that same gentleman who told us only a short time ago that food control had made food cheaper in Europe than in this country, who cited that as the chief reason why we should adopt food control here and incidentally make him the controller. I read bulletin 134:

No. 134.

[For release for morning papers of July 31, 1917.]

FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
PUBLIC INFORMATION DEPARTMENT,
July 30, 1917.

Ah, how happy a thing it is that we have at last a source of "public information"! This stupid press of ours has so utterly failed to carry us the news! The public have held out hands and begged for some kind of news; they have listened, and their ears have heard no news. The press of the country has not carried us any information, and so Mr. Hoover is forced to establish a public information department. Listen! I read Bulletin 134:

The demand for fats in Germany, notwithstanding the enormous quantities that have until recently been received through the neutral nations, is illustrated by advertisements in German newspapers just received here.

"For sale, for cash on delivery, fat for frying, 17 marks ($4.05) per pound," reads one advertisement.

Quoting again:

"Goose fat, 22½ marks ($5.36) per pound," reads another.

"Duck fat, one-fourth pound for 4.75 marks ($1.13)," is a Dresden bargain-sale announcement.

Salted goose legs are quoted at 94 cents each. Minced goose meat brings the same price. Larded goose breast, a delicacy, will cost the epicures $2.08 per pound. Fresh fowls for soup are quoted at from $1.01 per pound and up.

An official distribution of cheese is announced for Dusseldorf, with the announcement that there will not be sufficient to supply everyone, but that "those who were not supplied at the last distribution and also go empty at the forthcoming distribution will be given preference at the next distribution. They must therefore preserve the current voucher." Prices quoted are 82 cents per pound for Gouda and 36 cents per pound for Swiss cheese.

Young country laying hens are advertised for sale at $3.32 each. "Well-fed, snow-white Enden giant geese" are offered for sale at prices ranging from $11.91 to $19.06 each.

Think of a Thanksgiving dinner at those rates!

The egg ration at Hamburg for one week in June was one egg per person.

Rabbits bring high prices. "One buck, one doe, and three young rabbits" are offered for $8.34.

Horses are in great demand for killing, and delicacies made of horse flesh are advertised at prices varying from 53 cents to 86 cents per pound.

Mr. President, if those figures are accurate, if those prices are correct, we may as well to-day stop mobilizing troops, stop building a fleet of airplanes, hold back the hand of our warriors, and hang flags of peace on every capitol. If in Austria they are reduced to a point where prices such as I have read are demanded, then indeed is Austria starving to death, for such prices are never paid save by those who are famished. If those prices obtain, those mighty armies that have not yet been conquered by the gallant troops of France, of England, and Italy must soon yield to the pale soldiers of King Hunger.

Sir, when three rabbits will bring $8.34 you have a condition of starvation much like that of Jerusalem, of which it is recorded that mothers devoured their babes. This is the end, this is the extremity, this is the ghastly and final chapter of a people conquered by famine and destroyed by want, if indeed it be true. A chicken at $10! A simple meal in the cheapest restaurant $5!

Mr. President, if that be the condition of Austria and of Germany, then we may well build our bonfires to-night and send to the eyes of the waiting mothers who now look through tears upon the faces of boys about to be ravished from their homes the glad signal that the war is in fact over.

If anyone challenges my statement of fact, I answer it is not I who give you these assurances; they come from Mr. Hoover himself.

Not even "a miracle man," if he were among them, could save the German and the Austrian, not even a man who modestly would send to the press of the country for repetition and for print this statement of himself. I read the bullentin of July 13, for release on the same day.

[For release July 13, 1917.]

FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
FOOD CONSERVATION SECTION,
July 13, 1917.

Post-office clerks rubbed their eyes to-day when they found in an incoming mail sack a letter bearing no other address than "Mr. Miracle-Man Hoover, Washington." On a guess as for whom it was intended the letter was carried to Herbert Hoover, United States Food Administrator. The guess proved correct. The writer tells of the pressing need for food conservation, and adds "God bless you in your service to our country."

Mr. President, I have called attention to Germany. I am sorry to say there is a very black picture also presented of England, even under its food control.

Bulletin 128.

[For release for morning papers of July 30, 1917.]

FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
PUBLIC INFORMATION DEPARTMENT.

The radical increase in retail meat prices in England is shown in an official statement received to-day. Comparing prices for this year with those of 1914, the first year of the war, chilled beef has increased 152 per cent, and ordinary beef 139 per cent, while frozen beef has been taken off the market entirely. Ordinary mutton has increased 112 per cent, chilled mutton 147 per cent, frozen mutton 144 per cent. The increase in price of pork was 87 per cent.

Thus, Mr. President, I have ventured to take the time of the Senate in order to demonstrate to them, not by my word of mouth, not by the evidence of any ordinary man, not by the heretical assertion of some American citizen who still presumes to think and speak for himself, but out of the mouth of Mr. Hoover himself, that the hypothesis upon which the Senate was induced to act was a false one. That hypothesis being that food control in Europe had given them there lower prices than were being charged in the United States.

It now appears that the facts are that food control has not given them lower prices, but that they have much higher prices. That food control has not stopped the march of famine. That the attempt at food control even in Germany and Austria, where the iron discipline of centuries has chained and manacled the brains and souls of the people, has not made prices less than they are here. That even there they do not obey; even there "they strike"; even there, when they are denied a market for their food in one place, they send the food to another place. Yet if I were to demonstrate a thousand times over the fallacy upon which we are acting, if I were to prove it ten thousand times stronger than the truth itself could make it, I would not shake the purpose of a single man to vote for this bill. I shall, however, have the consolation of knowing that I have told the country, though in a voice that may not reach far, what I believe to be a part of the truth of this sad blunder, this tragic mistake we are about to make.

I call attention now to the claim made by Mr. Hoover that food control would crush the food speculator. Right here I pause to inquire whom Mr. Hoover included as food speculators? Was it not given to the country that the members of boards of trade, grain exchanges, and so forth, in our land were the chiefs of these sinners, and that against them these wolves of the exchange, these wild beasts of the market places, the country most needed protection?

Now, I pause to inquire, lest I should forget it later, who are the men, citizens of this country, whom Mr. Hoover has called to his advice? Are they not the chiefs of the grain exchanges? Are they not the men against whom all the country was warned? Are they not the kings of the grain and produce pits, those very institutions that four or five weeks ago we were told were dens of iniquity, in which gambling operations were carried on, where prices were sent kiting, and where diabolic plans were laid to rob the consumer and the producer alike? Yet, how great a transformation can be made. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, these men are changed from figures hideous and black and vile and loathsome and dangerous into angels of light and purity. For while, unlike Saul of Tarsus, they did not behold a great and shining light, to be thereby blinded and converted, do they not sit within the shadow of Mr. Hoover, and are they not thus transmogrified into guardians of the people?

Mark you, I do not say that these men were ever wicked; I do not charge that they were ever bad; but it was thus they were painted and pictured by the advocates of this bill; thus were they classed and thus was their class portrayed by Mr. Hoover himself.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. In connection with what the Senator from Missouri has said, I wish to ask him if he will permit me to have read an article from a newspaper in my State, the editor of which is a very reliable man, whom I know very well, showing who the assistant food administrator is and who has been appointed by Mr. Hoover to take care of the farmers in the western country.

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. GRONNA. I send to the Secretary's desk—as he is a much better reader than I am—an article which is headed "Minneapolis man named," and I desire that the article be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota asks that the article which he sends to the desk be read. Is there objection? There being none, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Fargo Blade, Fargo, N. Dak., July 28, 1917.]

MINNEAPOLIS MAN NAMED AS FOOD DIRECTOR—FRANK L. CAREY, CHAMBER OF COMMERCE GRAIN DEALER, IS CHOSEN BY HOOVER FOR ADMINISTRATOR IN NORTHWEST STATES—MAY ESTABLISH THE PRICES—WILL CONTROL ALL CEREALS AND FLOUR, DECIDING AMOUNTS FOR HOME CONSUMPTION AND FOR THE SHIPMENT ABROAD TO ALLIES.

Frank L. Carey, of Minneapolis, vice president of Hallet & Carey Co., grain commission dealers in the Chamber of Commerce Building, has been selected by Herbert C. Hoover as administrator of foods for the Northwest.

While Mr. Carey's title has not been established, and will not be until the food bill is passed by Congress, he will have complete governmental control of all foodstuffs shipped into St. Paul and Minneapolis for consumption in this country and for export abroad to the allies. He will say how much food is to be kept here and how much may be shipped out. As to many of the food products, his recommendation will fix the price to be paid the farmer and that which the consumer will have to pay.

Mr. Carey will not be appointed officially or given authority and a name for his job, until the food-control bill is passed.

The outstanding feature of Mr. Carey's work will be control of the flour and wheat situation.

Warehouse receipts for every bushel of wheat grown in Minnesota, the Dakotas, Iowa, and Wisconsin, shipped to St. Paul or Minneapolis, will have to pass through Mr. Carey's hands. He will determine whether the wheat is to be ground by the flour mills of the Northwest and held here for the consumption of people of the United States or be sold to the allies for consumption abroad.

At the same time he will have to figure how much flour will be required for the Army Uncle Sam is raising, and be sure that it is supplied.

In addition Mr. Carey will pass in the same manner on corn and corn meal, rye, and rye meal, flax, oats, meats, and, in fact, all foodstuffs that may be asked of us by the allies and neutral countries.

Part of his program will be the establishment of a great clearing house through which all foodstuffs will have to pass, in the sense of their control as to use here or abroad. This will require extensive offices, a large pay roll, and will mean the expenditure of large sums of money for the maintenance of his department.

Mr. Carey declines to discuss his appointment or plans. He is 50 years old. He was born in Owatonna, and has been in the grain commission business for 20 years in Duluth. He is a grain expert.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri further yield?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not wish unduly to take the time of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator from North Dakota is not worrying me.

Mr. GRONNA. But for the information of the Senate, I wish to state that this man Carey, who is a very able man, is one of the men who have made it not only possible but who have compelled the farmers of the Northwest to perfect an organization known as the Non-Partisan League. I am sure it will be welcome news to the 60,000 farmers of my State who belong to this league when they learn that this man Carey, who is one of the representatives of the Chamber of Commerce of Minneapolis, which for years have preyed upon the interests of the American farmer, has received the appointment of assistant food administrator. This is one of the men who will look after the farmers' interest and help stimulate production.

Not in the time of the Senator from Missouri, but a little later on, I am prepared to show some of the work which has been performed by this great expert organization, for I hold in my hand a book which was issued by the Non-Partisan League, which deals with the facts. This book was issued by them in June, 1917. It would, however, take several hours, I think, to go through this story, and I shall not attempt to do that now. Suffice it to say that Mr. Carey is one of the members of the organization which the farmers of the Northwest, and especially the Non-Partisan League, have repeatedly called, and will in the future call, "grain gamblers" and "food gamblers."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have not the benefit of the acquaintance of the gentleman in question. I merely suggest that when this plain, blunt man, who in part represents the great State of North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], makes a statement of the character which he has in this Chamber, it ought to receive some attention.

I was, however, speaking a moment ago of the other claim that was set up, that food control would end the reign of food speculators. I have already read certain statements of Mr. Hoover negativing that proposition, and I now desire very briefly to call attention again to his effusion of July 16, in which he states:

Lord Rhondda, food controller of Great Britain, finds the problem of the food speculator a paramount one, according to information received to-day by Herbert Hoover—

And the further statement that "the consumer in England, Lord Inchcape states, is paying from 36 to 48 cents a pound for meats" which costs from 9¾ to 10¼ cents a pound, "and he states it would be interesting to know where the difference goes."

So it appears that the food speculator is still abroad in merry England, notwithstanding all the powers of that great Government.

Again I call attention to circular 117, issued July 22. Now, mark you, they have had food control in England for three years. Of course, they did not have the "miracle man" there; they just had ordinary lords and dukes and common sort of folk; but here is what the "miracle man" tells us. I hope no wicked newspaper man will say I have spoken disrespectfully of Mr. Hoover because I have quoted his own phrase which he sent to the press. I do humbly beseech you I am only trying to talk in the language he himself has employed. I read now from Bulletin 117:

[For release for morning papers of July 23, 1917.]

FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
PUBLIC INFORMATION DEPARTMENT,
July 22, 1917.

Speaking with decided emphasis, Lord Rhondda, food controller of Great Britain, outlined his position toward the public in his recent speech at Cardiff. He stated his determination to stop speculation in the food of the people.

"I am going to come down on the profiteer like a hundredweight of bricks," he said. "I shall not be surprised if in a few weeks I enjoy a fair measure of unpopularity. I have a suspicious feeling that the reason the prime minister chose me for this very difficult job was that he knew I had the hide of a rhinoceros.

Mr. Hoover sends this out. Whether it is intended as a suggestion with reference to his own qualifications or not, I would not venture a suggestion, but, lest the implication might be lost, I call attention to the phrase. Continuing, I read:

The position I am going to take up is that of guardian and trustee of the consumer, more particularly the poor consumer.

I am determined if I can to put a stop to profiteering and speculation in food, and I believe that I can do it to a large extent. At the same time, the rise in prices is due also to war conditions, and it will be impracticable to bring down prices to anything approaching the pre-war standard.

So that it appears that the profiteer, the speculator, the man who "rigs" markets and boosts prices is still engaged in his nefarious operations in England, although food administration has been a benefaction granted under that Government for three or four years.

Mr. President, this brings me to one other theme to which I shall very briefly refer and to which I invite the attention of the Senators who are present. I have been a little curious to know why the conferees of the House and Senate not only insisted upon putting into the bill everything the House had in it originally, and which we labored for weeks to change, but why also they put new matter in the bill. I heard a report, which I thought was a wild report, that a certain Representative had come to some of the conferees and had said in substance and effect that it was demanded that the entire control of the farmers' grain should be placed in the food dictator so that the farmer in effect would have no market except that which the Government maintains.

If I mistake not, that provision or that condition was written in the bill in a somewhat covert but none the less effective way. That is a theme to which I intend to address myself on another occasion; but at this time I think I can furnish the country and the Senate the key to the performance. I find it in Bulletin 105, issued by Mr. Herbert Hoover. Notice the suggestion:

[For morning papers of July 19, 1917.]

HERBERT HOOVER,
Washington, D. C., July 18, 1917.

Resolutions adopted at the general conference of wholesale and retail distributing organizations held in New York recently indorsing the Lever bill and demanding its passage by Congress were received to-day by Herbert Hoover from John C. Orcutt, secretary of the food problem committee of the Merchants' Association of New York.

Now observe—

The resolutions declare that no amendments "meet with our approval unless they are first indorsed by Mr. Hoover."

This gentleman sends that statement to the country. For what purpose, unless it be to implanting in the minds of the people of the country the thought that a great organization has demanded that Mr. Hoover shall dictate all legislation in Congress relative to this matter? To what end is it sent out save to suggest to the American people that Herbert C. Hoover ought to dominate the Congress of the United States? That no law should be tolerated unless Mr. Hoover, who has lived 20 years of the 43 years of his life in England, who is connected with English companies and English interests, and who has been living in an English home, and whose home is now in England, shall grant his gracious permission; that without his permission Congress shall not legislate in regard to a bill that affects every farmer, every middleman, and every consumer of the United States. Mark you, he sends this out; he gives this to the wings of the press; he scatters this over the country, that he, Herbert Hoover, is to dictate; "that no amendments are to be accepted unless they meet with the approval of or unless they are first indorsed by Herbert Hoover."

Long ago a man stood and proclaimed the truth and then in the bitterness of his soul said: "I speak to the deaf ears of the adder." So I may speak to-day to Senators, yet I say now there can be but one reason for Mr. Hoover sending out that statement. It was because it was a photograph of his own soul; it was a picture of his own heart's desire; it was the thing he proposed to try to accomplish. This man, a voluntary expatriate from American soil during all of his adult life, comes back and sends to the American people a message that it had been resolved that no amendments to a great law of Congress—and it ought to be a great Congress, for it represents a great people—will meet with approval unless they are first indorsed by Mr. Hoover.

In all your lives you never saw a man so reaching out for power in this country and thus proclaiming his superiority to the regularly constituted legislative bodies of the land. Time may run its course, the seasons march by in their endless procession, until we shall all enter the shadow-lands, and each of us shall find repose within the darkened chambers of eternal silence; and yet no man here will ever again read, unless it be from this same man, a thing so insolent and so defiant of the majesty of the American people and their representatives in Congress assembled.

Mr. President, I am advised that the Senator in charge of the bill desires to adjourn. I have not yet begun to say the things I want to say regarding this bill and I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If the Senator would prefer to go on to-night, there is no disposition to interfere with the course of his remarks.

Mr. REED. No; I am entirely willing to quit. I am a little weary myself.

RECESS.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I move, then, that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until Monday, August 6, 1917, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 4, 1917.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our God, through whose benign influence we have been brought as a people to the present hour, may we not forget that as Thou holdest the individual responsible for his acts, so Thou holdest the Nation responsible for its acts. Make us, therefore, generous, noble, patriotic, righteous, since righteousness exalteth a nation, while sin is a reproach to any people.

Quicken us as individuals and as a nation, that in the present crisis we may be united in the bonds of patriotism and unselfish devotion to the principles of liberty; that our efforts may be successful in our struggle to preserve liberty, not only for ourselves but for the liberty-loving people of all the world, for Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment concurrent resolution of the following title:

House concurrent resolution 19.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H. R. 4285) entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," the Clerk be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to number the sections following section 4 of the bill in consecutive numerical order, anything in the conference report to the contrary notwithstanding.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 4285. An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made yesterday on the food-supply bill, on the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the food bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, there is pending a bill—H. R. 4954, the reclamation bill. I would like to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on that bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the reclamation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PATRIOTIC SONGS.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of patriotic songs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the subject of patriotic songs. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. DILL. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I promised the Whitney Boys' Chorus of 1,100 members, in the town of Spokane, that I would have printed in the RECORD a war song which they have adopted, and I will send it to the Clerk's desk and ask that it be read in my time. The words were written by Martheva S. Grupp, the mother of one of the boys, and the music by Rev. H. E. K. Whitney, the director of the chorus.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

STAND BACK OF OLD GLORY.

Oh, Uncle Sam's calling you mothers of men,
Whose far-reaching vision outstrips mortal ken,
To sing at the cradle there's joy in the world
Wherever Old Glory is freely unfurled.

Chorus.

Stand back of Old Glory on land and on sea,
Stand back of Old Glory, the world's hope is she;
Her watchword is "Freedom with justice to all."
Stand back of Old Glory is Uncle Sam's call.

The whole world has welcomed the red, white, and blue,
Not conquest but freedom, O brothers, to you,
As over the ocean our ships proudly sail,
Stand back of Old Glory, her pow'r can not fail.

We're standing by Belgium, Great Britain, and France,
While Italy's brave ones with Russians advance
To make a new cradle for liberty's child,
Old Glory joins allies with youth undefiled.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Speaker, I regret that it was necessary to impose on the patience of the House by having this song read at this time. If it were not for the self-appointed censorship of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], it would not have been necessary. I was forgetful of the censorship that he had established when I made this promise to those boys, and I therefore took the liberty of having the song read to the House.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

THE DRAFT IN OKLAHOMA.

Mr. FERRIS rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Oklahoma rise?

Mr. FERRIS. To ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the public prints of this city and I presume elsewhere are publishing all sorts of reports relating to conditions in my State with reference to the draft law. I do not know whether the reports are true or false. Good men in and out of Congress, as well as in my State, differed as to the merits of the draft law when it was enacted, as they had a perfect right to do, but I want to say to the House and to the country that there is no considerable portion of my State that is not upholding the draft law. It being the law, any attempt to evade it or break it down or to interrupt the progress of its enforcement will be promptly dealt with, and dealt with in an efficient manner. [Applause.]

I felt that it was due not only to the House but also to my State and the delegation that this statement should be made.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. DYER. There is no charge, so far as this situation in Oklahoma is concerned, to the effect that it was organized by citizens of German blood?

Mr. FERRIS. No. I make no charge at all. I merely say my people will adhere to this and every other law.

Mr. DYER. I am surprised that that statement has not been made.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

PREFERENTIAL SHIPMENTS.

Mr. ADAMSON. I call up the conference report on S. 2356, the preferential-shipments bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve a point of order against the conference report.

The SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. KEATING. The point of order is that the conferees have exceeded their authority.

The SPEAKER. In what?

Mr. KEATING. In the bill as it came from the Senate section 1 contained this proviso:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect either section 6 or section 20 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

The SPEAKER. Is that a Senate amendment?

Mr. KEATING. That was a part of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. And this is the Senate bill?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, when the House committee reported the bill to the House that provision was stricken out. After a considerable controversy, the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], agreed to accept that proviso and have it inserted in the bill. It was accepted by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman, When did the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] make any such promise?

Mr. KEATING. He did not make any promise. It was accepted on the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. That same provision?

Mr. KEATING. That exact provision. Now these conferees come back here with that provision stricken out.

Mr. ADAMSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. It is contained in the bill.

Mr. SIMS. I offered that amendment, and it was agreed to, and is now a part of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will read the section as it appears in the bill.

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect either section 6 or section 20 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

Mr. KEATING. Where is that?

Mr. ADAMSON. It appears at the end of the third paragraph of the conference report.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman from Colorado will yield, I may clear up the matter. The gentleman's difficulty is that he is referring to a print of the bill as it was reported to the House, which did not contain the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, and he is not referring to the conference report, which contains the identical language that the gentleman refers to.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order. It is a case of mistaken identity. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to reading the statement in lieu of the report?

There was no objection.

The conference report and statement follow:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 126).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2356), having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

"That section 1 of the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as heretofore amended, be further amended by adding thereto the following:

"'That on and after the approval of this act any person or persons who shall, during the war in which the United States is now engaged, knowingly and willfully, by physical force or intimidation by threats of physical force obstruct or retard, or aid in obstructing or retarding, the orderly conduct or movement in the United States of interstate or foreign commerce, or the orderly make-up or movement or disposition of any train, or the movement or disposition of any locomotive, car, or other vehicle on any railroad or elsewhere in the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and for every such offense shall be punishable by a fine of not exceeding $100 or by imprisonment for not exceeding six months, or by both such fine and imprisonment; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized, whenever in his judgment the public interest requires, to employ the armed forces of the United States to prevent any such obstruction or retardation of the passage of the mail, or of the orderly conduct or movement of interstate or foreign commerce in any part of the United States, or of any train, locomotive, car, or other vehicle upon any railroad or elsewhere in the United States engaged in interstate or foreign commerce: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to repeal, modify, or affect either section 6 or section 20 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914.

"'That during the continuance of the war in which the United States is now engaged the President is authorized, if he finds it necessary for the national defense and security, to direct that such traffic or such shipments of commodities as, in his judgment, may be essential to the national defense and security shall have preference or priority in transportation by any common carrier by railroad, water, or otherwise. He may give these directions at and for such times as he may determine, and may modify, change, suspend, or annul them, and for any such purpose he is hereby authorized to issue orders direct, or through such person or persons as he may designate for the purpose or through the Interstate Commerce Commission. Officials of the United States, when so designated, shall receive no compensation for their services rendered hereunder. Persons not in the employ of the United States so designated shall receive such compensation as the President may fix. Suitable offices may be rented and all necessary expenses, including compensation of persons so designated, shall be paid as directed by the President out of funds which may have been or may be provided to meet expenditures for the national security and defense. The common carriers subject to the acts to regulate commerce or as many of them as desire so to do are hereby authorized without responsibility or liability on the part of the United States, financial or otherwise, to establish and maintain in the city of Washington during the period of the war an agency empowered by such carriers as join in the arrangement to receive on behalf of them all notice and service of such orders and directions as may be issued in accordance with this act, and service upon such agency shall be good service as to all the carriers joining in the establishment thereof. And it shall be the duty of any and all the officers, agents, or employees of such carriers by railroad or water or otherwise to obey strictly and conform promptly to such orders, and failure knowingly and willfully to comply therewith, or to do or perform whatever is necessary to the prompt execution of such order, shall render such officers, agents, or employees guilty of a misdemeanor, and any such officer, agent, or employee shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both, in the discretion of the court. For the transportation of persons or property in carrying out the orders and directions of the President, just and reasonable rates shall be fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission; and if the transportation be for the Government of the United States, it shall be paid for currently or monthly by the Secretary of the Treasury out of any funds not otherwise appropriated. Any carrier complying with any such order or direction for preference of priority herein authorized shall be exempt from any and all provisions in existing law imposing civil or criminal pains, penalties, obligations, or liabilities upon carriers by reason of giving preference or priority in compliance with such order or direction.'"

And the House agree to the same.

T. W. SIMS,
JOHN J. ESCH,
Managers on the part of the House.

FRANCIS G. NEWLANDS,
ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The only difference in the bill agreed upon by the conferees and the substitute adopted by the House is the following amendment, inserted in the House substitute, which amendment very much simplifies and facilitates the service upon the carriers of such orders as the President may issue for preferential shipments:

The common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, or as many of them as desire so to do, are hereby authorized without responsibility or liability on the part of the United States, financial or otherwise, to establish and maintain in the city of Washington during the period of the war an agency empowered by such carriers as join in the arrangement to receive on behalf of them all notice and service of such orders and directions as may be issued in accordance with this act, and service upon such agency shall be good service as to all the carriers joining in the establishment thereof.

W. C. ADAMSON,
T. W. SIMS,
JOHN J. ESCH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1816) to enlarge the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

Mr. ADAMSON. I ask that the statement be read in lieu of the report. It is short.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks to have the statement read in lieu of the report. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement of the managers on the part of the House.

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 125).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1816) having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

"That section 24 of an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be further amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 24. That the Interstate Commerce Commission is hereby enlarged so as to consist of nine members, with terms of seven years, and each shall receive $10,000 compensation annually. The qualifications of the members and the manner of the payment of their salaries shall be as already provided by law. Such enlargement of the commission shall be accomplished through appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, of two additional Interstate Commerce Commissioners, one for a term expiring December 31, 1921, and one for a term expiring December 31, 1922. The terms of the present commissioners, or of any successor appointed to fill a vacancy caused by the death or resignation of any of the present commissioners, shall expire as heretofore provided by law. Their successors and the successors of the additional commissioners herein provided for shall be appointed for the full term of seven years, except that any person appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the commissioner whom he shall succeed. Not more than five commissioners shall be appointed from the same political party.'

"SEC. 2. That section 17 of said act, as amended, be further amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 17. That the commission may conduct its proceedings in such manner as will best conduce to the proper dispatch of business and to the ends of justice. The commission shall have an official seal, which shall be judicially noticed. Any member of the commission may administer oaths and affirmations and sign subpœnas. A majority of the commission shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business, except as may be otherwise herein provided, but no commissioner shall participate in any hearing or proceeding in which he has any pecuniary interest. The commission may, from time to time, make or amend such general rules or orders as may be requisite for the order and regulation of proceedings before it, or before any division of the commission, including forms of notices and the service thereof, which shall conform, as nearly as may be, to those in use in the courts of the United States. Any party may appear before the commission or any division thereof and be heard in person or by attorney. Every vote and official act of the commission, or of any division thereof, shall be entered of record, and its proceedings shall be public upon the request of any party interested.

"'The commission is hereby authorized by its order to divide the members thereof into as many divisions as it may deem necessary, which may be changed from time to time. Such divisions shall be denominated, respectively, division 1, division 2, etc. Any commissioner may be assigned to and may serve upon such division or divisions as the commission may direct, and the senior in service of the commissioners constituting any of said division shall act as chairman thereof. In case of vacancy in any division, or of absence or inability to serve thereon of any commissioner thereto assigned, the chairman of the commission, or any commissioner designated by him for that purpose, may temporarily serve on said division until the commission shall otherwise order.

"'The commission may by order direct that any of its work, business, or functions arising under this act, or under any act amendatory thereof, or supplemental thereto, or under any amendment which may be made to any of said acts, or under any other act or joint resolution which has been or may hereafter be approved, or in respect of any matter which has been or may be referred to the commission by Congress or by either branch thereof, be assigned or refered to any of said divisions for action thereon, and may by order at any time amend, modify, supplement, or rescind any such direction. All such orders shall take effect forthwith and remain in effect until otherwise ordered by the commission.

"'In conformity with and subject to the order or orders of the commission in the premises, each division so constituted shall have power and authority by a majority thereof to hear and determine, order, certify, report, or otherwise act as to any of said work, business, or functions so assigned or referred to it for action by the commission, and in respect thereof the division shall have all the jurisdiction and powers now or then conferred by law upon the commission, and be subject to the same duties and obligations. Any order, decision, or report made or other action taken by any of said divisions in respect of any matters so assigned or referred to it shall have the same force and effect, and may be made, evidenced, and enforced in the same manner as if made or taken by the commission, subject to rehearing by the commission, as provided in section 16a hereof for rehearing cases decided by the commission. The secretary and seal of the commission shall be the secretary and seal of each division thereof.

"'In all proceedings before any such divisions relating to the reasonableness of rates or to alleged discriminations not less than three members shall participate in the consideration and decision; and in all proceedings relating to the valuation of railway property under the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, by providing for a valuation of the several classes of property of carriers subject thereto and securing information concerning their stocks, bonds, and other securities," approved March 1, 1913, not less than five members shall participate in the consideration and decision.

"'The salary of the secretary of the commission shall be $5,000 per annum.

"'Nothing in this section contained, or done pursuant thereto, shall be deemed to divest the commission of any of its powers.'

"SEC. 3. So much of section 18 of the act to regulate commerce as fixes the salary of the secretary of the commission is hereby repealed.

"SEC. 4. That paragraph 2, section 15, of the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be further amended by adding the following: 'Provided further, until January 1, 1920, no increased rate, fare, charge, or classification shall be filed except after approval thereof has been secured from the commission. Such approval may, in the discretion of the commission, be given without formal hearing, and in such case shall not affect any subsequent proceeding relative to such rate, fare, charge, or classification.'"

And the House agree to the same.

STATEMENT.

The only differences between the bill agreed upon in conference and the House substitute is shown in the following amendments thereto, accepted by the House conferees:

Subject to rehearing by the commission as provided in section 16a hereof for rehearing cases decided by the commission.

The provision for review of orders issued by subdivisions of the commission was stricken out and in lieu thereof the above amendment was adopted, it being the opinion of the conferees that section 16a amply provided in full and proper way for rehearing in all cases of dissatisfaction.

2. In the requirement that a certain number of commissioners should act in any subdivision on particular subjects, the word "hearing" was stricken out where it occurred in two places and the word "consideration" substituted, and the word "hearings" was stricken out and "proceedings" substituted, so the bill as agreed upon provides that in consideration of rates three members shall participate in the consideration and decision and in proceedings relating to valuation not less than five members shall participate in the consideration and decision.

3. The Senate conferees insisted on the Smith amendment or something equivalent thereto. The House conferees agreed to a proviso substitute like it with the exception that it is limited to a period of time sufficient to enable Congress to legislate on the subject. The provision agreed upon is attached as section 4 of the bill agreed upon and constitutes the fourth amendment to the House substitute, which is as follows:

SEC. 4. That paragraph 2, section 15, of the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be further amended by adding the following: "Provided further, That until January 1, 1920, no increased rate, fare, charge, or classification shall be filed except after approval thereof has been secured from the commission. Such approval may, in the discretion of the commission, be given without formal hearing, and in such case shall not affect any subsequent proceeding relative to such rate, fare, charge, or classification."

W. C. ADAMSON.
T. W. SIMS.
JOHN J. ESCH.
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. WALSH. To propound a question to the chairman of the committee, if he will yield for that purpose.

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman of opinion that the clause which has been inserted by the conferees, providing for rehearings by the commission, as provided in section 16a, is sufficient to cover rehearings of cases heard by subdivisions of the commission?

Mr. ADAMSON. Section 16a makes full and ample provision for rehearing of all orders made by the commission. We thought it amply sufficient to say that in cases of orders issued by a subdivision of the commission, they could be reheard just as though made by the full commission, and subject to rehearing under the existing law.

Mr. WALSH. So the gentleman is of opinion that if one of the parties to a hearing before one of the divisions of the commission is dissatified, he can, upon following out the proper requirements, have a hearing before the full commission?

Mr. ADAMSON. Just as though the order had been issued by the full commission.

Mr. WALSH. Before any final order is issued by the commission?

Mr. ADAMSON. Just the same.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit a question?

Mr. ADAMSON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Section 4, as reported by the conferees, reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That paragraph 2, section 15, of the act to regulate commerce approved February 4, 1887, as amended, be further amended by adding the following: "Provided further, That until January 1, 1920, no increased rate, fare, charge, or classification shall be filed except after approval thereof has been secured from the commission. Such approval may, in the discretion of the commission, be given without formal hearing, and in such case shall not affect any subsequent proceeding relative to such rate, fare, charge, or classification."

It says that this approval may be without a formal hearing, but refers to approval "from the commission." Do those words, "from the commission," mean a majority of the commission?

Mr. ADAMSON. The word "commission" has a technical meaning. It means all nine of the members, or a quorum thereof. Therefore we never say "as a whole" or "the whole commission," because the word "commission" means the entire commission.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. So it would require action by the commission in order to give this approval.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; no subdivision can do it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Now will the gentleman please state what is meant in the statement of the committee by the language that the Senate insisted on the Smith amendment? Just what was the Smith amendment?

Mr. ADAMSON. The Smith amendment provided that in case of an objection filed to a rate, filed in accordance with section 15, if any objection was filed the commission should suspend the rate and proceed to a hearing, which might continue for 10 months, or less, if the investigation of the commission ended sooner. The House rejected that amendment, preferring to retain the present law, that the commission should have the discretion to suspend the rates. In conference we had numerous propositions to compromise. Twice we agreed to report a disagreement, and finally it was suggested, in view of the fact that the point was so hotly contested, that we ought to have time to legislate deliberately upon a change of the law. We called in the commission and talked to them, and we found from them that this compromise would be entirely workable and do no injustice to anybody, and therefore we saved a disagreement by accepting the compromise. It gives a little over two years in which Congress can thrash out the subject and decide whether it wants to change the law or not.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. According to section 4, as I read it, the railroad companies, after the adoption of this report, will not be permitted to file application for increase of rates without the consent of the commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think that is right? Does the gentleman from Georgia think that is fair to the railroad companies?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, we did an unusual thing; we had a representative of the railroads before us and the commissioners, and they sat there and talked with the representative of the railroads about it, and the representative of the railroads said that he had no objection to it. It was conceded by the representative of the railroads and the commission that this amendment would be workable and would work no harm to anybody. Here is the way it is explained: If there is a necessity for an increase of rates, the railroads will state to the commission what the proposition is. If the commission is not satisfied from the record and from what it knows of the situation, it will have hearings, and then approve or disapprove the rates. But it was stated that the commission has a great many facts already and that they could tentatively allow the increase of rates and correct them later if they were not satisfactory after they were allowed.

Mr. MADDEN. The mere filing of the application for increase of rates does not involve an acceptance of the rates by the commission.

Mr. ADAMSON. That means the approval of the rate itself and not the approval of the filing, but it was explained in this way: We first proposed that they approve the filing, but the commission said that would make ten times as much work as it would to approve the rates, because if they filed the rates and then gave 30 days' notice the commission would have to investigate all of them, and it would make interminable labor. Under this provision nothing but meritorious applications would be made, and they could be handled easily and expeditiously.

Mr. MADDEN. So, as a matter of fact, this obviates the necessity of giving the 30 days' notice of filing.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; it does not change the law.

Mr. MADDEN. The commissioners have to approve it immediately after being filed.

Mr. ADAMSON. Before it is filed.

Mr. MADDEN. They do not do that now.

Mr. SIMS. No.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the conference report was agreed to was laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, before the Chair recognizes some other gentleman I would like to ask a question of the gentleman from North Carolina and the House. There are three or four bridge bills remaining undisposed of, and if we are going to take three-day recesses they will be neglected. I want to suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina before he agrees on any program, that we consent to some arrangement to pass these bridge bills.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think we can take up those by unanimous consent before we adjourn to-day.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question. What day next week does the gentleman from North Carolina propose to adjourn to?

Mr. KITCHIN. To adjourn over until Tuesday, and then we will try to make a gentleman's agreement to adjourn every three days, with the understanding that no business shall be transacted until the Senate passes the revenue bill, which I think will take at least three weeks.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask unanimous consent that on next Tuesday, immediately after the reading of the Journal, my colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. On what subject?

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. On the war.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that on next Tuesday, after the reading of the Journal and the cleaning up of business on the Speaker's table, his colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], may have the privilege of addressing the House for not more than 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understood the gentleman from North Carolina to say that he would ask unanimous consent for a recess, during which no business would be done. Is that correct?

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. If that is the case I shall feel obliged to object to this request. If this request is granted, other requests will have to be granted.

Mr. KITCHIN. Does the gentleman have in mind any special business that he wants brought up?

Mr. CRAMTON. It seems to me that whenever the period begins during which the House shall do no business, no business should be done. It is not necessary for us to have a lot of speeches made which will detain some Members here to see that nothing is done.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I imagine that on the gentleman's side and on this side there will be several Members who will stay here to see that the agreement is carried out, and I take it, too, if we make the gentlemen's agreement that every man will keep it.

Mr. CRAMTON. When is the agreement to begin?

Mr. KITCHIN. I would say after we adjourn to-day. Why not just have a general consent that on Tuesday next nothing shall be done after the reading of the Journal except to permit these speeches to be made?

Mr. CRAMTON. There are several reasons. If there is a general rain of speeches made, with a great many Members away, we may have speeches made of the character that we had yesterday, during which there will be criticism of other Members who are away, and perhaps there may be abuse of the privilege.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. There are a couple of Members on the gentleman's side who desire to speak on Tuesday.

Mr. GILLETT. As I understand it, the agreement would be that we would not ask unanimous consent after to-day even to make a speech, so that if we agree not to permit these speeches on Tuesday it does not mean that we shall allow others.

Mr. KITCHIN. Unless we include that in the agreement to-day.

Mr. GILLETT. So that after Tuesday there would be none.

Mr. KITCHIN. None.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make this suggestion to the gentleman from North Carolina. He has not yet made his request, has he?

Mr. KITCHIN. No.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I suggest to the gentleman, if I may be permitted to do so, that he consider this phase of the matter before making that request and before we enter into that iron-clad gentlemen's agreement, and that is the possibilities that may arise by the action or nonaction of another legislative body. If the Senate should fail to agree to the conference report upon the food bills, of course that would necessitate a further conference. I do not anticipate myself that it will fail to agree, but at the same time we ought not to be tied up in a gentlemen's agreement here under which a large number of Members would go away.

Mr. KITCHIN. When I make the request, which I shall do presently, I shall include in it provision that if the Senate should reject the conference report, necessitating our coming back, I should give three or five days' notice to everyone.

Mr. SIMS. We do not want to wait too long.

Mr. KITCHIN. But there is no danger in the world, as I understand it, that the Senate will reject the conference reports. I have talked with several Senators this morning, and they say there is hardly a possibility of that being done.

Mr. GILLETT. May I suggest to the gentleman that I think he ought to have that provision reserved, in any event, so that he can summon us with five days' notice if it is so desired, because something else of an imperative nature may come up. I think the gentleman ought to have that in his agreement anyway.

Mr. KITCHIN. I think that is true. Something unforeseen may happen.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HULBERT. To propound an inquiry. Mr. Speaker, this House by a unanimous vote on the bill appropriating $640,000,000 for aeronautics gave expression to the view that it believes that mastery of the air will be decisive in this war. On the 31st of July there were two bills introduced——

The SPEAKER. Has what the gentleman is about to say anything to do with this proposition?

Mr. HULBERT. Yes, sir. On the 31st of July two bills were introduced, one in the Senate and the other in the House. Those bills are now pending before the respective Committees on Military Affairs of the two bodies. They are approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. They provide for the creation of an aircraft production board and give it certain authority to expedite the manufacture of aeroplanes. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from North Carolina that whatever agreement is made ought to take into account the fact that if the House committee should unanimously report this bill out, or if the bill is unanimously reported out in the Senate, which I was informed over there this morning was likely to occur Monday, and it is passed next week, when I am told it will be brought up for consideration, then its consideration here ought not to be delayed by these three-day adjournments until the end of this month.

The SPEAKER. Which House is the gentleman talking about when he says it is likely to pass on Monday?

Mr. HULBERT. The Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina suggests that we are going to adjourn until Tuesday.

Mr. HULBERT. But I understand that he is going to prefer a request that no business can be taken up on Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is simply asking for information.

Mr. McKENZIE. Is the bill to which the gentleman refers the bill which provides that the War Department may have the power to make advances to certain men who seem to have neither money nor credit, with which to build aeroplanes?

Mr. HULBERT. No, sir. The bill I have reference to is to create an air board, provide for its maintenance and to give certain authority so that they may expedite the production of aeroplanes.

Mr. MADDEN. There is already an air board now presided over by an Army officer.

Mr. HULBERT. The board created now has no legal existence, as I understand it.

Mr. MADDEN. But the Government has legal power——

Mr. KITCHIN. I would like to say to the gentleman from New York that the failure to pass that bill does not interfere at all with the aircraft construction status. They have a board only it is not legalized. If the bill is passed, it only gives the board the power and authority to recommend. They are recommending now.

Mr. MADDEN. They have the power to contract.

Mr. FERRIS. I should think that could wait.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the request of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. WALSH. I will withhold the demand for the regular order for a moment.

Mr. McKENZIE. I would like to ask the gentleman a further question. I understood the gentleman from New York to say that he had information that this bill would be reported from the Committee on Military Affairs unanimously?

Mr. HULBERT. No; I said if it is reported from the Committee on Military Affairs unanimously——

Mr. McKENZIE. Oh, well; "if"——

Mr. HULBERT. That there ought not then to be any objection to its consideration here.

Mr. MADDEN. It ought not to be reported at all.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I renew my demand for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that on next Tuesday, after the reading and adoption of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, his colleague from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER] shall be permitted to address the House not to exceed 30 minutes, of course having always the right of way saved for conference reports, revenue bills, and such stuff as that.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to couple with that request that Miss RANKIN be permitted to address the House for 10 minutes on the same day, after the remarks of Mr. COLLIER.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman hitch that on as an amendment?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the Collier speech?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, one moment. Did I understand the gentleman to say that he would hitch it on?

The SPEAKER. No. Is there objection to the Collier speech? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] asks unanimous consent that at the close of the Collier speech the lady from Montana [Miss RANKIN] shall be permitted to address the House not to exceed—30 minutes. [Applause.] Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] may address the House for 30 minutes after the other speeches have been finished.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] asks unanimous consent that at the close of Miss RANKIN'S speech the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] may address the House not to exceed 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I should like the same privilege after the other speeches of 15 minutes in which to address the House on the subject of taxation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] asks unanimous consent that at the close of the speech of Mr. HAYDEN he shall be permitted to address the House for not to exceed 15 minutes on the subject of taxation. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to propound an inquiry to the gentleman.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we have a gentleman's agreement——

The SPEAKER. One moment. The gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I was going to ask unanimous consent to call up a resolution.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House enter into a gentleman's agreement that we adjourn to-day over until Tuesday next, and that after the reading of the Journal and the making of those speeches on Tuesday next the House shall adjourn over until the following Friday, and thereafter adjourn over for three days at a time until the Senate passes the revenue bill; but that if, in the meantime, any unforeseen emergency makes it necessary that Members shall return, I shall give them five days' notice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on next Tuesday, and that then, after the reading and approval of the Journal on Tuesday and the making of these speeches that have been provided for and the consideration of any conference reports, the House shall, after Tuesday, adjourn for three days at a time.

Mr. KITCHIN. I shall change that to three days' notice instead of five days if it becomes necessary to send notice to Members.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I did not understand that any conference reports were to be considered.

The SPEAKER. Well, leaving out conference reports, then, the gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on next Tuesday, and that when it adjourns next Tuesday it shall adjourn three days at a time thereafter until the Senate passes the revenue bill, reserving, however, the right, if anything of importance arises in the meantime, to call Members back upon giving three days' notice.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Speaker, I shall object to the three days.

The SPEAKER. Now, it is understood that if this request be granted, the Chair, after Tuesday, when we meet after these three-day adjournments, shall not recognize anyone for anything except the motion to adjourn. [Applause.]

Mr. RAKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. RAKER. I would like to propound an inquiry to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN], if I can get his attention. I would like to ask the gentleman if he intends to ask unanimous consent that we take up to-day bills on the Unanimous-Consent Calendar?

Mr. KITCHIN. I am not going to move to adjourn until you gentlemen get a chance to get unanimous consent to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, in case this proposed agreement should be consented to, would there be any objection to Mr. BAER, the Member elect from the first district of North Dakota, taking the oath of office?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina will give heed to the gentleman from North Dakota. The gentleman from North Dakota was propounding a question. He will please repeat the question.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I think that Mr. BAER, the Member elect from the first district of North Dakota, will be here within 10 days, and of course he will desire to be sworn in as soon as he arrives. It seems to me that there ought not to be any objection to his taking the oath of office.

Mr. KITCHIN. It could be objected to under this agreement.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not believe the House could make any agreement as to that.

Mr. KITCHIN. We will include that, Mr. Speaker—that he can do it at any time.

The SPEAKER. That is included in the request—that he can be sworn in if he appears.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from North Carolina. I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina, with reference to House joint resolution 115, which treats of a question that is of great importance to certain portions of the country. Is it intended to bring that up and dispose of it to-day?

Mr. KITCHIN. That is the intention, I will say to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, if I understand correctly, the unanimous consent covers an adjournment on Tuesday and every three days thereafter, after the reading of the Journal?

The SPEAKER. After the adoption of the Journal.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; the adoption or approval of the Journal.

Mr. KITCHIN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina one question. He says, "Unless certain legislation became necessary."

Mr. KITCHIN. Something unforeseen.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Who is to determine whether it is necessary or not?

Mr. KITCHIN. I will call gentlemen together the best I can.

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman from North Carolina is to determine it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman indicate now what he thinks will be necessary?

Mr. KITCHIN. I see nothing in sight that would be.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HULBERT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have made several efforts to have a resolution of inquiry considered by this House, a resolution calling upon the Postmaster General to furnish to the House certain information as to the suppression of papers. Unless I can get that resolution considered I shall object to every unanimous-consent request.

Mr. KITCHIN. Let me say to the gentleman from New York, Why not let us get this agreement, and then you can get unanimous consent?

Mr. LONDON. I want to be assured that this resolution can be considered. I want that settled now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, in order to expedite matters, I object to the unanimous-consent request.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky object to the Kitchin request?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is the one I object to, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER] is recognized.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, we have nothing to do here to-day. We have got to stay here, and I move that the House adjourn. We have got to stay here all the time. We will be kept here.

Mr. HULBERT. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from North Carolina yield?

Mr. HULBERT. I demand the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. KITCHIN. I withdraw my motion to adjourn, and yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina withdraws his motion to adjourn.

Mr. GARNER. I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question. If there is objection to three days' adjournments, can the House understand that, so far as those who remain here are concerned, they will undertake to adjourn the House from day to day, so that Members may go home if they want to? I want it understood that those who remain here—and I expect to remain here, for one—will make an effort each day to adjourn the House, so that those who want to go home may go home.

The SPEAKER. While the Chair does not think any such agreement as that is in order, he will make this suggestion to the gentleman from Texas that any gentleman can move to adjourn, and any gentleman can raise the point of order that there is no quorum present, and there is no sort of trouble generally about adjourning.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest as a compromise to allow the resolution of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] to come up, and we can dispose of it.

Mr. MADDEN. I object. I do not believe in letting any one Member bulldoze the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I prefer a unanimous-consent request?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. That the House now proceed to the consideration of bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] asks unanimous consent that the House now take up the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. STAFFORD. Subject to the right of objection.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. KITCHIN. I want to give notice, since we can not get this agreement, which I hoped we could get and which I believe we ought to get, that I believe the House is entitled to this little vacation, because we have waited here for a month or two for the Senate to discuss and get through with the food bill, and we have waited since May 23 when we sent the revenue bill to them, and they have not even reported it out yet. They reported out one revenue bill and then repudiated it and took it back, and we do not even know when they are going to report it out. I do not know why the House should be compelled to stay here waiting for the Senate. So I am going to renew my request that I made a moment ago.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Has the gentleman from North Carolina considered at all the expediency of a concurrent resolution of the two Houses?

Mr. KITCHIN. Then we would have no adjournment until December, because the Senate would recess, too, and we want the Senate to get to work.

Mr. MONTAGUE. If I understand the gentleman, he does not think a concurrent resolution to that effect is practicable?

Mr. KITCHIN. No; I do not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina renews his request that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Tuesday, and that when it adjourns on Tuesday it adjourn three days at a time until the Senate passes the revenue bill. In the meantime, if anything is necessary to be done, he states that he will give the House three days' notice. Is there objection?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to give notice to the House, so that Members who want to go home and who ought to be permitted to go home can do so, that each day after the Journal is read and approved and after these speeches that we have agreed to hear have been made, I shall move the adjournment of the House, and do everything I can to secure an adjournment. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. For what length of time?

Mr. KITCHIN. Until the Senate passes the revenue bill, and if anything comes up I will give three days' notice.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. How can the Journal be approved if there is no quorum present?

The SPEAKER. It can not, if the point is made; but the gentleman can move to adjourn.

Mr. GARNER. In other words, everybody can go home.

Mr. KITCHIN. I will try to see that no business shall be done.

Mr. BUTLER. That is perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. KITCHIN. Now, I will say to the gentleman who had these requests for unanimous consent for the consideration of bills that we will stay in session to-day to enable them to present their requests.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 57.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 57.

Mr. CARLIN. Reserving the right to object, what does it relate to?

Mr. LONDON. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. CARTER of Oklahoma. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. LONDON. No; I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count to see if there is a quorum. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-one Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. It is too late now. The Chair has counted. The gentleman from North Carolina moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 258 Members, a quorum, have answered to their names.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I now renew the request that I made a moment ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina renews the request that he made twice earlier in the day as to adjournment. Is there objection?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask whether there is any objection to fixing an hour for the consideration of the resolution I have referred to after we reconvene? I feel that I am not being treated fairly when there is a good chance to bring up the resolution.

Mr. AUSTIN. Why does not the gentleman go before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads?

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the request of the gentleman from North Carolina to adjourn until next Tuesday, and an adjournment three days at a time, with the understanding that if anything of importance arises he will give three days' notice. Is there objection?

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman whether he will include in his request——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has demanded the regular order, and the regular order is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. [Applause.]

INCLUSION OF ALIENS IN THE ARMY AND NAVY.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up House joint resolution 115, requesting the Secretary of State to open diplomatic negotiations with certain Governments with a view to obtaining their approval and sanction for action by the United States permitting the inclusion in the armed forces of the United States of such citizens of the countries of such Governments as are within the United States.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 115. Is there objection?

Mr. GORDON. I object.

NATURALIZATION.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take up for immediate consideration the bill H. R. 3132, on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 3132. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Let the bill be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2171 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be amended so when amended it shall read as follows:

"SEC. 2171. No alien who is a native citizen or subject, or a denizen of any country, State, or sovereignty with which the United States is at war at the time of his application, shall be then admitted to become a citizen of the United States; but persons resident within the United States or the Territories thereof on the 6th day of April, 1917, who had before that day made a declaration according to law of their intentions to become citizens of the United States, or who, by the existing laws of the United States, were on that day entitled to become citizens, without making such declaration, may be admitted to become citizens thereof, notwithstanding they shall be alien enemies at the times and in the manner prescribed by the laws heretofore passed on that subject: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be taken or construed to interfere with or prevent the apprehension and removal, agreeably to law, of any alien enemy at any time previous to the actual naturalization of such alien."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are no copies of the bill available at the desk. Will the gentleman, before consent is given, give us some idea of the purposes of the bill?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No. I object to the consideration of bills of which we have not printed copies. We are entitled to notice of anything of this kind.

Mr. RAKER. There are printed copies.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I shall continue my objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS BIG SANDY RIVER, KY.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5335) to extend the time for constructing a bridge across the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River near Warfield, Ky., and Kermit, W. Va., authorized by an act approved January 28, 1916, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to remind the House that a good many Members are not here, because, I assume, they thought that under the circumstances no legislative business would be transacted to-day. Under the rules of the House the Calendar for Unanimous Consent is to be called on certain specified days in each month. Of that fact each Member of the House has notice, because he is presumed to know the rules. But he does not know, if he is now absent, that an effort is being made to have bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar called to-day. Remembering, as I do, what used to take place when men came back after an absence from the Chamber to find that bills to which they were strongly opposed had been passed by the House by unanimous consent, they having no way of knowing when those bills were coming up, and remembering, as I do, that the rule establishing the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was adopted by the House expressly for the purpose of stopping that sort of proceeding, I object now to the calling of the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman does that will he yield for a question?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No. Occasionally, it is true, there is a bill which demands immediate consideration in order to meet a real emergency, sometimes national in character, and then unanimous consent for its consideration may be rightfully asked, but I object to this sort of procedure at this time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the order heretofore made, the House adjourned until Tuesday, August 7, 1917, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] is detained on account of illness and that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] is detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is is a quorum present.

WAR WITH GERMANY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the Kaiser's account of the origin of the war as reported by Ambassador Gerard in the Philadelphia Public Ledger, and an editorial from the New York Tribune on the state of the war.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"MY FOUR YEARS IN GERMANY"—AMBASSADOR GERARD'S BOOK—AMERICAN DIPLOMAT'S EXPERIENCES AT GERMAN COURT UNTIL ENTRANCE OF THE UNITED STATES INTO THE GREAT WAR—GERMAN EMPEROR'S SUPPRESSED CABLE—AUTOGRAPH MESSAGE TO PRESIDENT WILSON NOW PUBLISHED FOR THE FIRST TIME—EXPLAINS ENTERING WAR—EX-AMBASSADOR GERARD PRESENTS IMPERIAL ACCOUNT SHOWING GERMANY WAS AGGRESSOR.

[By James W. Gerard, American Ambassador at the German imperial court, July 28, 1913, to February 4, 1917.]

FOREWORD.

I am writing what should have been the last chapter as the foreword of this book, because I want to bring home to our people the gravity of the situation; because I want to tell them that the military and naval power of the German Empire is unbroken; that of the 12,000,000 men whom the Kaiser has called to the colors but 1,500,000 have been killed, 500,000 permanently disabled, not more than 500,000 are prisoners of war, and about 500,000 constitute the number of wounded or on the sick list of each day, leaving at all times about 9,000,000 effectives under arms.

I state these figures because Americans do not grasp either the magnitude or the importance of this war. Perhaps the statement that more than 5,000,000 prisoners of war are held in the various countries will bring home to Americans the enormous mass of men engaged.

There have been no great losses in the Germany Navy, and any losses of ships have been compensated for by the building of new ones. The 9,000,000 men and more—for at least 400,000 come of military age in Germany every year—because of their experience in two and a half years of war, are better and more efficient soldiers than at the time when they were called to the colors. Their officers know far more of the science of this war and the men themselves now have the skill and bearing of veterans.

GERMAN NATION WILL NOT STARVE OR REVOLT.

Nor should any one believe that Germany will break under starvation or make peace because of revolution.

The German nation is not one which makes revolutions. There will be scattered riots in Germany, but no simultaneous rising of the whole people. The officers of the army are all of one class, and of a class devoted to the ideals of autocracy. A revolution of the army is impossible, and at home there are only the boys and old men, easily kept in subjection by the police.

There is far greater danger of the starvation of our allies than of the starvation of the Germans. Every available inch of ground in Germany is cultivated, and cultivated by the aid of the old men, the boys, and women and the 2,000,000 prisoners of war.

The arable lands of northern France and of Rumania are being cultivated by the German Army with an efficiency never before known in these countries, and most of that food will be added to the food supplies of Germany. Certainly the people suffer; but still more certainly this war will not be ended because of the starvation of Germany.

Although thinking Germans know that if they do not win the war the financial day of reckoning will come, nevertheless, owing to the clever financial standing of the country by the Government and the great banks, there is at present no financial distress in Germany; and the knowledge that unless indemnities are obtained from other countries the weight of the great war debt will fall upon the people perhaps makes them readier to risk all in a final attempt to win the war and impose indemnities upon not only the nations of Europe but upon the United States of America.

We are engaged in a war against the greatest military power the world has ever seen; against a people whose country was for so many centuries a theater of such devastating wars that fear is bred in the very marrow of their souls, making them ready to submit their lives and fortunes to an autocracy which for centuries has ground their faces, but which has promised them, as a result of the war, not only security but riches untold and the dominion of the world; a people which, as from a high mountain, have looked upon the cities of the world and the glories of them and have been promised these cities and these glories by the devils of autocracy and of war.

We are warring against a nation whose poets and professors, whose pedagogues, and whose parsons have united in stirring its people to a white pitch of hatred, first against Russia, then against England, and now against America.

The U-boat peril is a very real one for England. Russia may either break up into civil wars or become so ineffective that the millions of German troops engaged on the Russian front may be withdrawn and hurled against the western lines. We stand in great peril, and only the exercise of ruthless realism can win this war for us. If Germany wins this war, it means the triumph of the autocratic system. It means the triumph of those who believe not only in war as a national industry, not only in war for itself, but in war as a high and noble occupation. Unless Germany is beaten, every nation will be compelled to turn itself into an armed camp until the German autocracy either brings the whole world under its dominion or is forever wiped out as a form of government.

FROM NOW ON WE NEED THE DOERS.

We are in this war because we were forced into it, because Germany not only murdered our citizens on the high seas but filled our country with spies and sought to incite our people to civil war. We were given no opportunity to discuss or negotiate. The 48 hours' ultimatum sent by Austria to Serbia was not, as Bernard Shaw said, "a decent time in which to ask a man to pay his hotel bill." What of the six-hour ultimatum given to me in Berlin on the evening of January 31, 1917, when I was notified at 6 that ruthless warfare would commence at 12? Why, the German Government, which up to that moment had professed amity and a desire to stand by the Sussex pledges, knew it took almost two days to send a cable to America! I believe that we are not only justly in this war but prudently in this war. If we had stayed out and the war had been drawn or won by Germany, we would have been attacked—and that while Europe stood grinning by—not directly at first, but through an attack on some Central or South American State to which it would be at least as difficult for us to send troops as for Germany. And what if this powerful nation, vowed to war, were once firmly established in South or Central America? What of our boasted isolation then?

It is only because I believe that our people should be informed that I have consented to write this book.

There are too many thinkers, writers, and speakers in the United States; from now on we need the doers, the organizers, and the realists, who alone can win this contest for us, for democracy, and for permanent peace!

Writing of events so new, I am, of course, compelled to exercise a great discretion, to keep silent on many things of which I would speak, to suspend many judgments, and to hold for future disclosure many things the relations of which now would perhaps only serve to increase bitterness or to cause internal dissension in our own land.

The American who travels through Germany in summer time or who spends a month having his liver tickled at Hamburg or Carlsbad, who has his digestion restored by Dr. Dapper, at Kissingen, or who learns the lost art of eating meat at Dr. Dengler's, in Baden, learns little of the real Germany and its rulers, and in these articles I tell something of the real Germany, not only that my readers may understand the events of the last three years, but that they may judge of what is likely to happen in our future relations with that country.

I.

FIRST DAYS OF THE GREAT WAR; POLITICAL AND DIPLOMATIC.

At the commencement of the great war I was for some days cut off from communication with the United States, but we soon established a chain of communication—at first through Italy and later by way of Denmark. At all times cables from Washington to Berlin, or vice versa, took on the average two days in transmission.

After the fall of Liege, Von Jagow sent for me and asked me whether I would transmit through the American legation a proposition offering Belgium peace and indemnity if no further opposition were made to the passage of German troops through Belgium. As the proposition was a proposition for peace, I took the responsibility of forwarding it, and sent the note of the German Government to our minister at The Hague for transmission to our minister in Belgium.

Dr. Van Dyke, our minister at The Hague, refused to have anything to do with the transmission of this proposition and turned the German note over to the Holland minister of foreign affairs, and through this channel the proposition reached the Belgian Government.

AN AUDIENCE WITH KAISER WILHELM.

The State Department cabled me a message from the President to the Emperor, which stated that the United States stood ready at any time to mediate between the warring powers, and directed me to present this proposition direct to the Emperor.

I therefore asked for an audience with the Emperor, and received word from the chief court marshal that the Emperor would receive me at the palace in Berlin on the morning of August 10. I drove in a motor into the courtyard of the palace and was there escorted to the door, which opened on a flight of steps leading to a little garden about 50 yards square, directly on the embankment of the River Spree, which flows past the royal palace. As I went down the steps the Empress and her only daughter, the Duchess of Brunswick, came up. Both stopped and shook hands with me, speaking a few words. I found the Emperor seated at a green iron table under a large canvas garden umbrella. Telegraph forms were scattered on the table in front of him, and basking in the gravel were two small dachshunds. I explained to the Emperor the object of my visit, and we had a general conversation about the war and the state of affairs. The Emperor took some of the large telegraph blanks and wrote out in pencil his reply to the President's offer. This reply, of course, I cabled immediately to the State Department. The document is as follows: "10/VIII 14.

"For the President of the United States personally:

"1. H. R. H. Prince Henry was received by his Majesty King George V in London, who empowered him to transmit to me verbally that England would remain neutral if war broke out on the Continent involving Germany and France, Austria and Russia. This message was telegraphed to me by my brother from London after his conversation with H. M. the King, and repeated verbally on the twenty-ninth of July.

"2. My ambassador in London transmitted a message from Sir E. Grey to Berlin saying that only in case France was likely to be crushed England would interfere.

"3. On the thirtieth my ambassador in London reported that Sir Edward Grey in course of a 'private' conversation told him that if the conflict remained localized between Russia—not Serbia—and Austria, England would not move, but if we 'mixed' in the fray she would take quick decisions and grave measures; i. e., if I left my ally, Austria, in the lurch to fight alone, England would not touch me.

"4. This communication being directly counter to the King's message to me, I telegraphed to H. M. on the twenty-ninth or thirtieth, thanking him for kind messages through my brother, and begging him to use all his power to keep France and Russia—his allies—from making any warlike preparations calculated to disturb my work of mediation, stating that I was in constant communication with H. M. the Czar. In the evening the King kindly answered that he had ordered his Government to use every possible influence with his allies to refrain from taking any provocative military measures. At the same time H. M. asked me if I would transmit to Vienna the British proposal that Austria was to take Belgrade and a few other Serbian towns and a strip of country as a 'main-mise' to make sure that the Serbian promises on paper should be fulfilled in reality. This proposal was in the same moment telegraphed to me from Vienna for London, quite in conjunction with the British proposal; besides, I had telegraphed to H. M. the Czar the same as an idea of mine before I received the two communications from Vienna and London, as both were of the same opinion.

"5. I immediately transmitted the telegrams vice versa to Vienna and London. I felt that I was able to tide the question over and was happy at the peaceful outlook.

"6. While I was preparing a note to H. M. the Czar the next morning, to inform him that Vienna, London, and Berlin were agreed about the treatment of affairs, I received the telephones from H. E. the Chancellor that in the night before the Czar had given the order to mobilize the whole of the Russian Army, which was, of course, also meant against Germany; whereas up till then the southern armies had been mobilized against Austria.

"7. In a telegram from London my ambassador informed me he understood the British Government would guarantee neutrality of France, and wished to know whether Germany would refrain from attack. I telegraphed to H. M. the King personally that mobilization being already carried out and could not be stopped, but if H. M. could guarantee with his armed forces the neutrality of France I would refrain from attacking her, leave her alone, and employ my troops elsewhere. H. M. answered that he thought my offer was based on a misunderstanding; and, as far as I can make out, Sir E. Grey never took my offer into serious consideration. He never answered it. Instead he declared England had to defend Belgian neutrality, which had to be violated by Germany on strategical grounds, news having been received that France was already preparing to enter Belgium, and the King of the Belgians having refused my petition for a free passage under guarantee of his country's freedom. I am most grateful for the President's message.

"WILLIAM, I. R."

A DOCUMENT IN THE CASE.

In the current Atlantic Monthly there is an article by Mr. Vernon Kellogg, an American who worked within the German lines for the relief of the inhabitants of the invaded districts, which seems to the Tribune one of the most admirable documents so far published, setting forth the truth of the German idea and method. This article ought to be read by those who are honestly and earnestly seeking light and striving to get an accurate and just understanding of what the German spirit means to all of us.

Mr. Kellogg went abroad as a neutral, determined to remain neutral in act and in attitude. He knew Germany and spoke German. He lived with German officers and at German headquarters, meeting many of the leaders not merely in the army but in German life and thought. He saw the German occupation as it actually was from Lille to Charleville. He heard the German case stated by Germans.

Of his observations he writes:

"The danger from Germany is, I have said, that the Germans believe what they say. And they act on this belief. Prof. von Flussen (a German associate) says that this war is necessary as a test of the German position and claim. If Germany is beaten, it will prove that she has moved along the wrong evolutionary line, and should be beaten. If she wins, it will prove that she is on the right way, and that the rest of the world, at least that part which we and the allies represent, is on the wrong way and should, for the sake of the right evolution of the human race, be stopped and put on the right way—or else be destroyed as unfit.

"Prof. von Flussen is sure that Germany's way is the right way, and that the biologic evolutionary factors are so all controlling in determining human destiny that this being biologically right is certain to insure German victory. If the wrong and unnatural alternative of an allied victory should obtain, then he would prefer to die in the catastrophe and not have to live in a world perversely resistant to natural law. He means it all. He will act on this belief. He does act on it, indeed. He opposes all mercy, all compromise with human soft-heartedness. Apart from his horrible academic casuistry and his conviction that the individual is nothing, the State all, he is a reasoning and a warm-hearted man. So are some other Germans. But for him and them the test of right in this struggle is success in it. So let every means to victory be used. The only intelligence Germans should follow in these days is the intelligence of the general staff; the only things to believe and to repeat are the statements of the official bureau of publicity.

"There is no reasoning with this sort of thing, no finding of any heart or soul in it. There is only one kind of answer—resistance by brutal force; war to a decision. It is the only argument in rebuttal understandable of these men at headquarters into whose hands the German people have put their destiny."

And later he adds:

"'Military advantage,' 'military expediency'—how often have these phrases blocked us of the relief commission in our efforts in Belgium and northern France! No mercy, no 'women-and-children' appeals; no hesitation to use the torch and the firing squad, deportation, and enslavement. And it is all a part of Prof. von Flussen's philosophy; the pale, ascetic intellectual and the burly, red-faced butcher meet on common ground here. And then they wonder why the world comes together to resist this philosophy—and this butchery—to the death!"

Mr. Kellogg's conclusion is thus set forth:

"I went into northern France and Belgium to act as a neutral, and I did act as a neutral all the time I was there. If I learned there anything of military value which could be used against the Germans, I shall not reveal it. But I came out no neutral. Also I went in an ardent hater of war, and I came out a more ardent one. I have seen that side of the horror and waste and outrage of war which is worse than the side revealed on the battle field. How I hope for the end of all war!

"But I have come out believing that that can not come until any people which has dedicated itself to the philosophy and practice of war as a means of human advancement is put into a position of impotence to indulge its belief at will. My conviction is that Germany is such a people, and that it can be put into this position only by the result of war itself. It knows no other argument, and it will accept no other decision."

The great difficulty in making the American people realize the issue of this war is the lack of first-hand credible evidence, which would convince them of what Germany believes and what Germans, high and low, are doing and have been doing for three years. If only the mass of American people could see what a few have seen, the mobilization of American sentiment and service would be instant and complete.

Yet the real fact in this war is the German spirit, the deification of force, the sacrifice of right, honor, humanity to that "higher law" which is German ambition and German desire for world power. It is this that all civilization is fighting; it is this that will destroy all civilization, if it prevails.

With this theory peace is impossible; provinces, indemnities, colonies—these are of small importance. The German is seeking in respect to these, as he has sought in respect to all things, to confuse spiritual and material values. But this war can have but one value: All the misery, agony, sacrifice will be vain if any portion of the German doctrine of force survives.

It is a monstrous thing—this German terror that for three years has overhung all mankind. And now, when the end is in sight, when the defeat of force is at hand—now we must face the fact, see clearly the real issue, go forward to the true victory, which is not conquest of provinces, not the crushing of Germany, but the everlasting defeat of the German doctrine. While the Germans hold it, believe it, practice it, the world must fight, whether it be at the Marne, the Lys, or the Rhine. When the Germans renounce it in fact and not in phrase, then peace will come and must come.

The Reformation gave us religious liberty. Our own and the French revolutions gave up equality in the eyes of the law and in the conduct of government. The German war must give us ultimate security from the doctrine that might makes right and that the strong nation alone can live.

This is the third great struggle of modern history. It, too, is a war of ideas, a struggle between liberty and tyranny, between spiritual and material forces, and it must be fought out.

CONSERVATION OF FOOD—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the disposition of food products and fuel.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] had the floor at the time of the recess. I assumed that he was going on this morning. If not, I ask for a vote on the conference report.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I really hope that we shall be able to get through with the consideration of this bill without forgetting all of the amenities and courtesies that have heretofore been maintained between Senators. It is really painful to think that one can not turn aside for a moment to ask a brother Senator a question for information without the Senator in charge of the bill immediately endeavoring to get a vote upon the report. The spokesmen of the administration sometimes permit their zeal to outrun their fairness.

I regret that the time asked for the consideration of the report was not granted on Saturday and that I was compelled to proceed without being afforded the opportunity to carefully examine the bill. I regret that we are called in session this morning at 11 o'clock so that the lash of haste might again be laid upon our backs.

Of course those who expect to benefit by the bill and to go into office under the bill may be somewhat impatient, but the country that is to be subjected to this infamous dictatorship is not so impatient. Those of the country who are now clamoring for the passage of the bill and who for the most part have never read it will find their impatience for its passage speedily changed into an impatience because it did pass once they are put in touch with the greedy and arbitrary conduct of those who are to enforce the measure.

This will be especially true, as suggested to me by a Senator, unless Mr. Hoover possesses more discretion and forbearance in employing the powers granted than Congress has exercised wisdom in conferring them. Already I am told that Mr. Hoover has appointed 13 agents to take possession of the 13 terminal wheat markets of the United States. I may speak through mistake, I only speak upon information. What may be done or what may be doing we do not know, because we find a gentleman assuming powers that have not been granted and proceeding to the conduct of a business which up to this time Congress has not given him authority to act upon. What takes place, therefore, in this irregular way may be misunderstood, and I may be misinformed, but if I be not misinformed already the agents are appointed to take possession of the 13 great terminal wheat markets of the United States.

[At this point Mr. REED yielded to Mr. SIMMONS, who reported House bill 4280 from the Committee on Finance.]

Mr. REED. Mr. President, when I yielded to the Senator in charge of the revenue bill [Mr SIMMONS], I was saying that my understanding was that Mr. Hoover had already appointed 13 agents to take possession of the 13 terminal wheat markets. Of course, no authority has yet been granted, but that appears to make very little difference to Mr. Hoover. I am further informed that several of these gentlemen are native-born Englishmen. I am further informed that one of the gentlemen now associated with Mr. Hoover, who was formerly a very large grain merchant in this country, brought with him to Mr. Hoover some four of his former employees or associates in business, and that of these employees some two or three remain with Mr. Hoover, while another former employee goes to the Wheat Export Co.

What, pray, is the Wheat Export Co.? It is a combination of English companies organized for the purpose of controlling or handling all shipments intended to go to the allies.

I have already called attention to the fact that Mr. Hoover's home and business and house are in London; that his political affiliations, according to the statement of his eulogist, are with the Liberal Party of England. I also at this time call attention to the fact that he has brought here with him, according to my information—for we have no list of these employees—several gentlemen who, like himself, left America many years ago, and who have resided in London or other parts of England ever since. One of these gentlemen, who recently stoutly came to Mr. Hoover's defense, declaring that I had uttered an untruth upon the floor of the Senate, left America and resided in England long enough to take the benefit of the English bankruptcy courts. So it seems that English influence is already somewhat marked.

In addition to this, I want to call the attention of the Senators from Texas, if they are here, and of the Senators from Louisiana, if they be here—and if not, they can read the RECORD—to what I understand to be the present plan. Again, my information may be inaccurate, because the Hoover organization is not a public body and is not a legalized body; it is a self-constituted, voluntary body, which has seized the reins of power before the powers have been legally created. It has no public record; whether they have a private record or not, deponent saith not; but my information is that already the plan is made to circumscribe the shipments of grain that are to be made to the port of Galveston and to the port of New Orleans, and to divert these grains to the port of New York, the excuse being that it will save the hazarding of these grains upon the longer trip on the ocean. At the same time, every man who thinks about the matter will agree that it will vastly tend to overburden our already overburdened railway traffic. Besides, it will interfere with the markets, trade, and business of these several markets or ports. Of course the purpose of this bill, as I understand, is to interfere with all the avenues of trade and business, and instead of allowing the people of the United States to keep track of their own business, to transfer that business over into the hands of a gentleman who never conducted that kind of business, who has no experience in that kind of business, and who has not lived among the people of the United States for a score of years.

Mr. President, this statement I have made may prove inaccurate. I am stating it upon what I believe to be a sound source of information. It illustrates the evil that comes from permitting the sort of thing that is now going on and to which I have already sufficiently referred.

In that connection, and taking up the thread of my discourse where I left it on Saturday, I desire, even at the risk of the consumption of time, to return to the theme I was then discussing. I had called attention to the fact that Mr. Hoover, from his self-created place of business, run at the expense of the United States without any authority of Congress, is sending out, at the expense of the Federal Government, vast quantities of material to the press, which he asks the press to reproduce. Manifestly it is sent out in order to create a sentiment. What the sentiment is desired to create must be determined by the matter sent out. I called attention to the fact that among the documents sent out was one in which Mr. Hoover told the newspapers of the country that a resolution had been adopted by certain gentlemen "that no amendment to the present bill would meet with their approval unless first indorsed by Mr. Hoover." I called attention to the fact that Mr. Hoover manifestly wanted that doctrine to take root in the United States, or he would not have sent it broadcast to the press of the country, asking the press to reproduce it. Now, I call attention to the fact that in an interview with Mr. Hoover, which was printed in nearly every leading paper of the United States, this statement was made:

> Nobody knows what I am up against. Nobody knows the forces I have to fight. I have done everything in my power; still the food bill is held up. If it is not passed soon, I will go to the country and tell the people the truth. They shall know the men who are holding me back, and when the people know, Heaven help those men.

Why, a Dr. Cook on a rampage would not have said a thing of that kind.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. REED. Before I yield I desire to complete my statement. Some Senator from the floor said that Mr. Hoover repudiated the statement. I say in answer to that that he has never repudiated it through the press of this country. I further say that this statement appeared in the most respectable papers in the United States. It was sent out by a respectable news bureau or news bureaus, and Mr. Hoover has never publicly repudiated it. I am now about to show that, whether he ever made the statement or not, he has been acting in strict accordance with the threat he made. Now, I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President, because I think the Senator from Missouri does not wish to attribute to Mr. Hoover a statement which he never made, I have asked permission to interrupt him at this time. The Senator from Missouri will recall that when this particular statement was adverted to some days ago the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], in immediate communication with Mr. Hoover, upon the floor of the Senate stated an absolute and unequivocal denial from Mr. Hoover of any such statement or of any part of any such statement. The Senator from Missouri, I am sure, with that distinct and positive and unequivocal denial, would not wish now to attribute this particular emanation to Mr. Hoover again.

Mr. REED. I say to the distinguished Senator who rises to correct me that I do not desire to alter a word I have said. I said before the Senator rose that some Senator rising said that Mr. Hoover repudiated the statement, but I do not understand that he repudiated the interview in toto, but only certain parts of it. I shall have to refer to the RECORD to find out.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. GORE. I think it ought to be stated in this connection that in the afternoon papers of this city, after the Senator from Oregon had entered that disclaimer, there appeared another statement attributed to Mr. Hoover, in which he said that he would not make those disclosures at that time, but would wait until the bill had passed, would then survey the measure, and, if its powers were not sufficient, he would then take the American people into his confidence and unmask the obstructionists in the Senate. That was the apology that I saw in the public prints.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri further yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I saw no such publication. If the Senator from Oklahoma says there was such a one, I do not question that indeed there was such a one published. I have no recollection of it. I referred solely to the particular publication referred to by the Senator from Missouri that on this floor was adverted to by him on another occasion; and on this floor, when the first animadversions were made, the denial was prompt and the denial was full, from the Senator having charge of the bill, that Mr. Hoover had ever indulged in any such statements at all.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if that were true we would have the statement of reputable newspapers that Miss Helen Todd gave to them the statement that Hoover had said so, and accordingly we would have Miss Todd on the one hand and Mr. Hoover on the other. I know of no reason why we might not as well take the lady's statement as the gentleman's. But while I do not want to interrupt my discourse now to find the exact statement made by the Senator in charge of the bill [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], I do not think it was as broad as the Senator from California recollects it. Whether that is true or not, however, statements similar to that which the Senator from Oklahoma mentioned did appear in the afternoon papers of the very day this matter was first discussed in the Senate, and there never has been a denial by Mr. Hoover.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the question of a demonstration of Mr. Hoover's interference or attempt to interfere with the legislation of the Congress of the United States.

It will be remembered that when this bill was before the Senate it was amended many times, so many times that it was generally understood that the bill was beaten; and thereupon a number of Senators, whom the papers denominated "Senate leaders," got together and arrived at some sort of an understanding with reference to what was to go in the bill and what was to go out. That is, they agreed in some way to support the taking out of certain provisions and the putting in of certain other provisions. Acting with the other Senators was the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], undoubtedly acting in the best of faith, undoubtedly only endeavoring to do what he thought ought to be done with reference to this legislation. The Senator from New Hampshire and myself have often differed. We have differed on this bill; we have almost differed personally; and yet I have not challenged his good faith in the matters he has presented to Congress. Now, when the Senator from New Hampshire ventured to take a part with certain other Senators toward straightening out the difficulties as he saw them in the way of the passage of the bill, this is what Mr. Herbert C. Hoover sent to the press for publication:

> July 18, 1917. Herbert Hoover, Washington, D. C. For morning papers of July 19, 1917.

That is all in the headlines. Now follows the text:

> That the passage of the Hollis bill—

He at once denominated this measure as the Hollis bill—would permit gambling, speculation, and exportation—

It was meant to be "exploitation"— to proceed without restriction, and would leave the farmer and consumer alike substantially without protection, was the statement made to-day by representatives of farmers' unions, cooperative associations, grain growers, granges farmers' societies, and terminal houses. The Lever bill was indorsed and its final enactment into law demanded. The statement subscribed to by all the representatives was as follows—

And then follows the text, a part of which I shall read; and I shall ask leave to print it all, so that the country may have the benefit of the entire statement:

We are strongly opposed to the fixing of the exact amount of a minimum price for wheat by law, because we recognize that it is an expert question, to be settled after such consideration as Congress can not possibly give it and in a manner which will give the producer a full voice. The food administration should be vested with power to deal with this question.

We recognize that the minimum price of $1.75 for wheat, fixed in the so-called Hollis bill, is unwise and unjust to the producer, and was fixed without consultation with Mr. Hoover—

Behold! It was fixed without consultation with Mr. Hoover—or the food administration and against their protest.

We are opposed to the passage of the so-called Hollis bill because it permits gambling, speculation, and exploitation to proceed without restriction, exempts sugar, corn, and other products from many or all the provisions of the bill, and leaves the farmer and consumer alike substantially without protection.

We are opposed to the exemption of cooperative agricultural organizations from the provisions of the bill, thus preventing the food administration from dealing with them.

We favor the Lever food-administration bill as it passed the House, and demand its final enactment into law in that form. It is a workable bill; the Senate amendments are not workable.

We support the food administration unreservedly, and demand that sufficient power and discretion be given to it to enable it to protect both the producer and the consumer.

This statement was subscribed to by the following—

Then there is a long list of names, which I will print; and the following statement comes after the names:

During the day these representatives of agricultural interests called on Herbert Hoover.

Mr. President, I ask permission to print this statement in full in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[For morning papers of July 19, 1917.]

HERBERT HOOVER,
Washington, D. C., July 18, 1917.

That the passage of the Hollis bill would permit gambling, speculation, and exploitation to proceed without restriction and would leave the farmer and consumer alike substantially without protection was the statement made to-day by representatives of farmers' union, coop rative association, grain growers, granges, farmers' societies, and terminal houses. The Lever oill was indorsed and its final enactment into law demanded. The statement, subscribed to by all the representatives, was as follows:

"We are strongly opposed to the fixing of the exact amount of a minimum price for wheat by law because we recognize that it is an expert question to be settled after such consideration as Congress can not possibly give it, and in a manner which will give the producer a full voice. The food administration should be vested with power to deal with this question.

"We recognize that the minimum price of $1.75 for wheat, fixed in the so-called Hollis bill is unwise and unjust to the producer, and was fixed without consultation with Mr. Hoover or the food administration, and against their protest.

"We are opposed to the passage of the so-called Hollis bill because it permits gambling, speculation, and exploitation to proceed without restriction, exempts sugar, corn, and other products from many or all the provisions of the bill and leaves the farmer and consumer alike substantially without protection.

"We are opposed to the exemption of cooperative agricultural organizations from the provisions of the bill, thus preventing the food administration from dealing with them.

"We favor the Lever food administration bill as it passed the House and demand its final enactment into law in that form. It is a workable bill; the Senate amendments are not workable.

"We support the food administration unreservedly and demand that sufficient power and discretion be given to it to enable it to protect both the producer and the consumer."

This statement was subscribed to by the following:

During the day these representatives of agricultural interests called on Herbert Hoover.

Now, Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. Just a moment. I want to finish this theme, and then I shall gladly yield.

One of the first things President Wilson asked Congress to do was to drive from Washington what was called the organized lobby. A committee was appointed, of which I had the honor to be a member. The investigations of that committee disclosed that there were organiaztions here that at their own expense were sending out to the country false information, false statements, and creating propagandas in regard to legislation pending in Congress. The exposure shook the country. The conduct exposed was regarded as absolutely unjustifiable and iniquitous. The lobbies maintained their headquarters, they had agents scattered over the country, but they employed their own moneys for this purpose. Finally, when it was discovered that certain of their documents had been introduced in Congress and had been franked, the people of the country looked upon the performance with indignation. One great cause for congratulation that the Democratic Party had for itself in the last campaign, one thing that it catalogued among its achievements, was driving from Washington the lobby and its hirelings. That lobby, that invisible government, was trying to control legislation. That was its purpose. Nobody accused it of trying to buy people. It was accused of endeavoring to control legislation by sending out propagandas and statements and false reports.

What are we presented with to-day? The money of the United States Government employed to keep up an institution that has no official sanction, that exists without sanction of law, that has rented headquarters that cost the Government $35,000 a year, according to the press, that employs an army of men already, now proceeds to do that which the lobby did—to send out to the country its propaganda, to impudently interfere with pending legislation in Congress, and to assail the motives and asperse the conduct of Senators, calling them by name.

Why, this statement that was sent out against the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], to the effect that the bill had been transformed into one having his name, and that this bill that bore the Senator's name would permit gambling, speculation, and exploitation without restriction and leave the farmer and consumer alike substantially without protection. The charge, if true, would have destroyed the political influence of the Senator, would probably have driven him from the halls of Congress and from public life. Again, sir, the charge was sent out at the public expense by a man who only a few months or weeks ago was an inhabitant of England and whose house and home and business are in England to-day. And so I say to those Senators who rise and question my right to introduce this interview that the threat contained in that interview was carried out against the person and against the reputation of a Member of this body.

An attack upon myself of some pages in length was sent out by Mr. Hoover to the press. I pass that with the remark that I am making no complaint upon my own account.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I now yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. I come from the section of the country where at least a portion of the spring wheat is produced, and I am naturally much interested in the letter presented by the Senator from Missouri. I rose to ask the Senator if he would kindly read the names of those who signed the statement that they were opposed to fixing a minimum price? I think I might say that I would know whether they are representative men from the section of the country from which I come.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, rather than to take the time to do that, because there is a long list of names and they are scattered, I will send the paper to the Senator; and then, if he desires later to call attention to the names, I shall be glad to yield to him.

Mr. GRONNA. Very well. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that so far as I know no one from the State which I in part have the honor to represent has been here since the month of May. There was a delegation of farmers here which appeared before the Agricultural Committee of the House. They were authorized to speak for a great organization which has been formed in the western country, which is organized not only in my State but I think in 11 other western States; and those people asked that a minimum price should be fixed in the bill, which the House did not do.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, these attacks, as I have said, were printed at Government expense, without authority of law; at least, without any intended authority. They may be paid for out of this $100,000,000 that the Congress said the President might do with as he pleased, but if there be any authority it is that kind of authority.

Certain statements have been made from time to time that I have personally attacked Mr. Hoover. Mr. President, I deny that. I have called in question certain things in regard to Mr. Hoover that have a direct bearing upon the position which he seeks and which he now usurps. What have been my statements?

One is that Mr. Hoover has resided nearly all his life abroad.

Second. That his home and interests are almost entirely in Great Britain.

Third. That he is a promoter by occupation.

Fourth. That his operations in wheat and produce markets were responsible for some of the great fluctuations in prices which he has since charged to the boards of trade gamblers.

Fifth. I cited in support of these propositions certain statements made by Mr. Hoover, and certain other statements made by his eulogist. I now desire to call additional witnesses, to produce additional evidence.

In connection with the question of his residence abroad, and in support of the statement made by his eulogist that he is a promoter—a statement I read some days ago—I call attention to the following:

When Mr. Hoover was testifying before the Agricultural Committee on May 8, he was asked by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] to tell the committee something of himself. He made two statements which bear out two of the assertions I have just made. He answered:

I have pursued my profession as an engineer in all parts of the world for some 21 years—25 years, nearly—chiefly in Russia, Australia, India, China, and the United States. During the last 10 or 12 years I have made my headquarters between San Francisco and London. During the last 10 or 15 years my particular occupation has been the installation and management of new organizations. I have had rather a curious occupation, I think—being called in to build up new concerns.

It will be remembered that I read from his eulogist in the Saturday Evening Post that he was known by some French name which I have now forgotten, but which being translated into language that a Missourian can understand means "promoter." So we have it now from Mr. Hoover's own mouth that that is his business; I think he is now engaged in the largest promotion scheme he has ever undertaken in his life, and I venture the prediction, measuring and weighing my words, that that promotion when carried out will control the American markets for the benefit of the British markets.

Speaking now of his residence, he stated:

I have pursued my profession as an engineer in all parts of the world—

In nearly all parts of the world—for some 21 years—25 years, nearly—chiefly in Russia, Australia, India, China, and the United States.

But his service in the United States as an engineer was at the first part of that period.

During the last 10 or 12 years I have made my headquarters between San Francisco and London.

Now, let me read how he made his headquarters in San Francisco. I read from the Saturday Evening Post of June 23 from his eulogist, the article that the Senator from California stated was handed to him by the attorney of Mr. Hoover as the authentic story of Mr. Hoover's career. This is what it states:

Stanford University, in which he has always maintained a loyal interest, made him a trustee. Hoover, traveling from London to San Francisco via the fastest trans-Atlantic steamer and the Overland Limited, always made the meeting of the board of trustees.

Thus it appears that his visits to this country have been made on the fastest steamers and the fastest trains in order that he might get back to "dear old London," and get back quickly.

Mr. President, in connection with my remarks that Mr. Hoover had charged the speculators with running up prices and had denounced them, and in connection with my charge and the evidence I have heretofore produced that the market was rigged and that the very fluctuations and speculations of the market which Mr. Hoover charged to the gamblers had been in part at least caused by his own operations, I now desire to submit some further statements. I read from the statement of Mr. Hoover, made before the Committee on Agriculture, in which, speaking of the conditions of speculation, he said:

In our commercial distribution we are confronted daily and hourly with evidence of a large amount of rank speculation at every link of the distributing chain by persons not engaged in actual commerce of distribution.

He further added:

We must, in the first instance, put such restrictions upon the export of foodstuffs as will leave us a proper supply for our own people, lest with the great pull of this tremendous vacuum we be left next spring with insufficient supplies.

The second—that is, elimination of speculation and evil practices, is fundamentally the most difficult and must fill all concerned with the most continuous and deepest anxiety.

Later on in his testimony he said:

I do not assume that there was any one criminal, or any criminal in this, but there are 200,000, or perhaps half a million, agencies in this country interested in the distribution of wheat and flour, and all of them have received some benefit out of this rise and this margin between the producer and the consumer.

Elsewhere and at other times Mr. Hoover berated the food gamblers in language still more vigorous and charged that the rise in the price of wheat, the rise in the price of flour, which he said resulted in robbing the American people of $250,000,000 a month, was directly chargeable to the gambling operations of the grain exchanges.

Mr. President, I heretofore placed in the RECORD the statement of Mr. Hoover's eulogist in the article which the Senator from California said was authentic because it was handed to him by Mr. Hoover's attorney. This statement I desire again to call to the attention of the Senate. He speaks as follows of the operations of the Belgian Relief Commission, which was under the charge of Mr. Hoover:

But as to purchasing supplies, there were big men on the C. R. B.—

That should have been the B. R. C.—the Belgian Relief Commission—

But as to purchasing supplies, there were big men on the C. R. B., who needed no expert advice. They knew all the tricks of the business. When the price of beans began to rise, they bought 1,000 tons of beans and threw them back in one lot on the market.

Being interpreted, that means that they bought 1,000 tons of beans for future delivery, and that when the time came they then sold those beans, or threw them back on the market and broke the market. Continuing:

When the price of beans began to rise, they bought 1,000 tons of beans and threw them back in one lot on the market. Down went prices.

Now, having completed that operation, of course they took in a handsome profit.

They bought in small lots.

It is the trick of the food gambler to buy in small lots, so nobody may know he is buying; to buy futures secretly. That is what that means.

Slowly again the price began rising, but once more the terrific impact of 1,000 tons of beans was felt. Again the price dropped, and again their agents bought beans in small lots.

That is the method of every food gambler who has ever operated. This was not an attempt to get cheap beans for the Belgians, for having bought the beans cheap, in the first place, there was no necessity to throw them back on the market. If they wanted 1,000 tons of beans for the starving Belgians and had acquired them, why should they sell those beans again? There is no man living who is honest and understands anything about the methods of trade on boards of exchange but knows this was a gambling operation pure and simple. It is susceptible of no other construction. I continue to read on:

Again the price dropped, and again their agents bought beans in small lots.

So, again and again did that same 1,000 tons of beans hammer down prices and save the day.

"Hammer down prices and save the day"? Save the day for whom? From the first they had the 1,000 tons of beans, which was all they wanted. They hammered down prices and saved the day as any gambler hammers them down and saves the day. They broke the market. They took down a profit and then repeated the operation. What was the effect of that operation? Was it to benefit the American people, as some newspapers undertook to claim when I first brought the fact forward? If so, then every gambler who performs in a similar way benefits the American people. What is the difference in the effect upon the consumers in America between the Belgian Relief Committee buying a thousand tons of beans in small quantities, which means surreptitiously for future delivery, and then suddenly selling them and breaking the market, and then going into the broken market and buying again for future delivery and thus alternately bulling and bearing the market—what is the difference between that operation and the operation of a Mr. Patten, who in exactly the same way alternately played the bull and bear, and with the result that the American people have made his name anathema maranatha, at least so it was a few years ago?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator there?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Does the Senator claim that Mr. Hoover profited by that?

Mr. REED. Oh, the Senator asked that question before. I do not know anything about who profited. I am saying nothing about it and intimating nothing. If the Belgian Relief Committee got the profit, if the "price of the dog went into the temple of the Lord," it does not change the fact that it was "the price of the dog." It does not remove the fact that the food markets were overturned, that speculation was rife, that prices were run up, and that the toll was finally collected from the hands of the men and women who had to buy the products thus speculated in to feed their children.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I wish to ask the Senator, Does he claim that there is no distinction between the Belgian Relief Commission operating, as the Senator says, for the purpose of relieving a starving population and Mr. Patten, who was operating the market for his own advancement? Does the Senator compare the one with the other?

Mr. REED. In the proper sense of the term I make no distinction. What is the evil of gambling upon an exchange? Is it that some individual gets money by virtue of it and that he thereby enriches himself? Is that the evil? It does not make any difference to the American people whether Mr. Patten or Mr. Joe Leiter has won a hundred million dollars or ten million dollars or five million dollars. The evil is found in the fact that that hundred million dollars or the ten million dollars or the five million dollars by virtue of the manipulation of the market of the people has been extracted from the pockets of the people where it ought to be left. The evil consists not in the money that is accumulated by some man. The evil consists in rigging the market of the people by gambling in the foodstuffs the people must buy. The evil consists in the hardships that fall upon the producer and consumer whenever the gambler seizes the grain markets, upsets the prices, juggles with values, and produces bankruptcy, ruin, and want. I have heard the Senator from Oregon often demand the punishment of such men.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there was a society once in the world that said, "Let us do evil that good may come." There was a society once in the world that said, "It is all right to do anything if you do it in the service of the Lord."

But that is a doctrine which was repudiated long ago. I say there is a side to this question that makes it more wicked to gamble with the funds of the Belgian Relief Committee than to have gambled with private cash. Let me tell you why. The Belgian Relief Committee came to the good-hearted men and women of the United States. It held out its hands and said, "Behold a great people is starving. We ask you out of the generosity of your hearts and the kindliness of your souls to contribute." The millionaire took down his check book and wrote his checks for large sums. The man of moderate means took down his check book and wrote for smaller sums. At last it came down to the man with little means, the fellow who found it hard to battle against the wolf of want, and even he dug from almost empty pockets his farthings and his pence. In the generosity of his heart he gave that the money might go over to Belgium and it there might do the blessed work of Christian succor and aid. To employ a trust fund of that kind, raised in the United States of America, in gambling operations so as to run up the prices of food of the very people who contributed the money was a betrayal of trust. It was the use of a trust fund in a nefarious and in a wicked manner. I declare that it was worse to take that fund and thus jeopardize it than it would have been to have taken private money and similarly jeopardize it. Gentlemen will get little consolation from that argument.

Mr. LEWIS. May I ask the Senator from Missouri, Has there been any reply from Mr. Hoover as to this matter, which is frequently charged? What is the version of Mr. Hoover? I know the Senator would be glad to give it, because the Senator is a just man, and I should like myself to know what his reply was.

Mr. REED. The only reply I have seen was printed in the newspapers. I was just coming to it; I had it before me, but I was diverted from immediate use; because the Senator in charge of the bill thinks if you take church moneys contributed to the cause of the Lord and go down and gamble with them and make more money and turn it into the church the gambling operation is all right.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I want to say to the Senator from Missouri, if he will permit me to interrupt him, that the Senator from Oregon made no such claim as that.

Mr. REED. No; I mean that is the logic of the Senator's position. To bring it right home, the Senator thinks that if you collect money to feed the hungry and take that money and jeopardize it in gambling operations and win it is all right. That kind of morality has long been the subject of humor. There is an old, old story covered with the dust of ages and sanctified by time to the intendment and effect that some ladies were talking about the wickedness of gambling, and one of the ladies said, "I see no wrong in my husband playing cards, as my husband always wins and gives the money to me." That exactly illustrates this proposition. Suppose the trust money had been lost, who would have made it up? There has been many a young gentleman who has employed upon the stock exchange money he held in trust, hoping to win and expecting to restore every dollar, but when he failed whose money was lost?

Here is the only reply I have ever seen. I am now answering the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

After the close of the Senate session—

I am reading from a newspaper clipping which was in a number of papers—

After the close of the Senate session John Beaver White, member of President Wilson's American committee of the Belgian Relief Commission, issued a statement declaring Senator REED's charge that Herbert Hoover conducted "gambling operations" in buying for the commission was absolutely untrue.

"The purchase of foodstuffs in the United States for the Belgian relief have been made from the beginning absolutely by the American committee," said Mr. White. "Neither Mr. Hoover nor the American committee ever speculated in any—

Neither Mr. Hoover nor the American committee, said this gentleman—ever speculated in any commodity purchased for the Belgian relief. I recall that in setting up the American organization Mr. Hoover stated: "I do not want myself to handle any of these hundreds of millions of dollars, for some day some swine will turn up in this country and say I have stolen it."

Mr. President, the article I read from the Saturday Evening Post with reference to the operation in beans was written by Mr. Irwin. It was one of a series of articles printed by the Saturday Evening Post in eulogy of Mr. Hoover. According to the statement of the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], who rose here to defend Mr. Hoover, it was—I quote his language—"an inspired article." He later said that the reason he said it was an inspired article was because it was handed to him by the attorney of Mr. Hoover as an authentic account of Mr. Hoover's career. So I put against Mr. John Beaver White's statement the statement of the Senator from California and the statement of the Saturday Evening Post, together with the fact that the article was printed, and that it has remained undenied during all of these months. If anybody sees fit to challenge further the truth of this statement thus written and thus vouched for and put forward by these friends of Mr. Hoover as a true account of the operations of Mr. Hoover, I invite a senatorial investigation. You will find none of the gentlemen demanding it, but if they do, I shall be glad to have it.

Mr. President, who is Mr. John Beaver White? This article states:

Mr. John Beaver White, a member of President Wilson's American committee.
